conflict had severely undermined the education system in the northern regions of the country, but that the return of the administration and the renewal of cooperation with education partners had enabled many schools to reopen in the regions of Mopti, Timbuktu and Gao. Lastly, the Government indicated that an Interim Programme for the period 2015–16 had been adopted, pending the forthcoming adoption of a Ten-Year Education Development Programme (PRODEC II) following the evaluation of PRODEC I. In 2012–13, the gross enrolment rate was 69.7 per cent for primary education and 50 per cent for secondary education, and the drop-out rate was 8.3 per cent in primary education. The Committee observed a very broad disparity in these rates between regions.

The Committee notes the Government’s indication that the Interim Programme is under evaluation and that it has been extended until 2018. PRODEC II is still being developed. The Committee takes due note of the final evaluation report of PRODEC of November 2015 communicated by the Government under the Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138), which shows that, following an initial period of rapid growth in school enrolment and the completion rate for basic education, such growth slowed down and most indicators began to drop as of 2010. Although there is still strong resistance and discrimination surrounding schooling for girls, the reduction of gender disparities is one of the significant achievements of PRODEC I in relation to girls’ and boys’ access to and completion of basic education. The Committee notes that the evaluation of PRODEC I has enabled the formulation of recommendations for PRODEC II, which include speeding up efforts to promote enrolment in basic education, continuing to reduce disparities based on area of residence and on gender, qualifications for teachers in basic education and the revitalization of non-formal education. The Committee also takes due note of the statistics provided by the Government under Convention No. 138 on basic education for the school years 2013–14, 2015–16 and 2016–17, and welcomes the efforts made by the Government to provide such statistics. It notes that the gross enrolment rate was 72.1 per cent for primary education and 49.2 per cent for the first stage of secondary education. The Committee therefore points out that the gross school enrolment rate has not improved since 2013. Moreover, the Committee observes that there are significant regional disparities in terms of access to education. The completion rates for primary education and the first stage of secondary education have increased, but are still low, with a completion rate of 48.1 per cent for primary education and 35.4 per cent for the first stage of secondary education.

The Committee notes that, in its concluding observations of July 2016, the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW) expresses concern at the extremely low completion rate for girls at the secondary level; the poor quality of education; and rural–urban disparities. CEDAW also expresses concern at the existence of a parallel education system with Koranic schools that remain outside the purview of the Ministry of Education (CEDAW/C/MLI/CO/6-7, paragraph 29). The Committee also observes that the report of the UN Secretary-General dated 25 September 2018 shows that 735 schools remained closed at the end of the 2017–18 school year, affecting 332,400 children (S/2018/866, paragraph 63). The United Nations Multidimensional Integrated Stabilization Mission in Mali (MINUSMA) and the OHCHR have also noted the occupation of school premises by armed groups in some areas of northern Mali (A/HRC/WG.6/29/MLI/2, paragraph 60). The Committee expresses its concern at the large number of children deprived of an education due to the armed conflict affecting northern Mali. While acknowledging the difficult situation prevailing in the country, the Committee urges the Government to step up its efforts to improve the functioning of the education system and to provide access to free basic education, by increasing school enrolment rates, both at the primary and secondary levels, and by reducing the drop-out rates in all regions of the country. In this regard, it requests the Government to provide information on the progress achieved and the results obtained through the implementation of the Interim Programme 2015–16 and PRODEC II.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 2001)

The Committee notes the observations of the General Confederation of Workers of Mauritania (CGTM) received on 31 August 2018 and requests the Government to provide its comments in this respect.

The Committee notes that the Government’s report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments initially made in 2015.

Article 1 of the Convention. National policy and application of the Convention in practice. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the indications of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), according to which the Ministry of Labour authorized, without exception, work by 13-year-old children in both the agricultural and non-agricultural sectors. The Committee noted that, according to the study undertaken by the Government in collaboration with UNICEF, some 90,000 children under 14 years of age were working in the country.

The Committee notes the observations from the CLTM, to the effect that young children are working in hazardous conditions in agriculture, small-scale fishing, construction and garbage removal, including the children of slaves and former slaves. The CLTM also indicates that these children work throughout the day without any rest period, which causes them multiple health problems. The Committee duly notes the Government’s indication that a National Plan of Action on the Elimination of Child Labour 2015–20 (PANETE–RIM) was adopted on 14 May 2015. It notes that the PANETE–RIM forms part of the implementation of the roadmap for combating the vestiges of slavery, Recommendation No. 17 of which is concerned with taking account of action against child labour in agreements signed between the State and international enterprises. The Government indicates that the National Plan of Action comprises five strategic components, namely: strengthening legal and institutional frameworks; building technical and operational capacity; raising awareness and increasing knowledge of child labour; implementing direct action to combat child labour in spheres and sectors of use and exploitation; and collaboration, coordination and partnership. The Committee further notes the observations of the CGTM to the effect that the social partners have been associated with the formulation and design of the PANETE–RIM. The Committee also notes the Government’s indication that the setting up of 30 communal child protection systems in 10 wilayas (regions) has enabled care to be provided for 10,782 victims of child labour. However, it observes that, according to the “MICS4 – Multiple indicator cluster survey” finalized by the National Statistics Office in 2014 and quoted in the PANETE–RIM, 22 per cent of children between 5 and 14 years of age are involved in child labour. While noting the measures taken by the Government, the Committee is bound to express its concern at the situation of children working below the minimum age, often under hazardous conditions. The Committee therefore urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure the effective abolition of child labour and to provide information on the activities and results achieved through the implementation of the National Plan of Action on the Elimination of Child Labour 2015–20 (PANETE–RIM).

Article 2(3). Compulsory schooling. The Committee previously noted the information provided by the Government to the effect that one of the methods to ensure the abolition of child labour was the adoption of Act No. 2001-054 of 19 July 2001, making basic education compulsory for children of both sexes from 6 to 14 years of age, with a minimum six-year period of schooling. However, the Committee noted a low enrolment rate in primary education and a very low enrolment rate in secondary education.

The Committee notes the Government’s information to the effect that the Centre for the Protection and Social Integration of Children (CPISE) has enabled more than 1,000 children who had dropped out of school to resume their education. The Committee also notes the establishment of a unit within the Ministry of Education which has responsibility for dealing with out-of-school children, according to the UNICEF annual report for 2013 (page 17). However, the Committee notes the observations from the CLTM that the State is making no effort to create conditions conducive to ensuring schooling for children and an acceptable standard of living, pointing out that most adwabas (former slave villages) do not have a school or basic services. The Committee also notes that, according to the UNICEF report, non-attendance at school remains a major challenge in Mauritania. It also notes that, according to the 2015 joint report produced by the Government and ILO–IPEC on child labour in Mauritania, school wastage is one of the main reasons for the large number of children on the labour market in Nouakchott (page 20). While taking due note of the measures provided for in the PANETE–RIM, including support measures for the ZEP programme (concerning priority education areas) to reduce school wastage and increase the attendance rate (objective 4.2), the Committee notes with concern the persistence of low school attendance rates, especially at secondary level, according to UNESCO statistics for 2013, which indicate that the net primary school enrolment rate is 73.1 per cent, the net secondary school enrolment rate is 21.6 per cent, and the primary school completion rate is 64.1 per cent. Recalling that compulsory schooling is one of the most effective means of combating child labour, the Committee once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures, including as part of the implementation of the PANETE–RIM, to provide compulsory education until the minimum age for admission to employment, increasing the primary and secondary education enrolment rates and reducing the drop-out rate. The Committee requests the Government to supply information on any new developments in this respect.

Article 7(3). Determination of light work. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that, under section 154 of the Labour Code regulating the employment of children between 12 and 14 years of age in light work, no child over 12 but under 14 years of age may be employed without the express permission of the Minister of Labour, and only under certain conditions restricting the hours of this employment. The Committee reminded the Government that Article 7(3) provided that, in addition to the hours and conditions of work, the competent authority should determine the activities in which light employment might be permitted for children between 12 and 14 years of age. The Committee noted the Government’s indication that a copy of the provisions determining the activities in which light employment or work may be permitted for children would be sent to the Office once they had been adopted.

The Committee notes the absence of information on this matter in the Government’s report. Observing that a significant number of children are working below the minimum age for admission to employment in Mauritania, the Committee once again urges the Government to take the necessary measures, particularly in the context of the implementation of objective 1.2 of the PANETE–RIM, to bring the national legislation into line with the Convention and to regulate the employment of children of 12–14 years in light work.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 2001)

The Committee notes the observations of the General Confederation of Workers of Mauritania (CGTM) received on 31 August 2018 and requests the Government to provide its comments in this respect.

The Committee notes that the Government’s report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments initially made in 2015.

Article 3 of the Convention. Worst forms of child labour. Clause (a). Slavery or practices similar to slavery. 1. Sale and trafficking of children. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the adoption of Act No. 025/2003 of 17 July 2003 concerning the suppression of trafficking in persons. The Committee also observed that Mauritania appeared to be a country of origin for the trafficking of children for labour exploitation.

The Committee notes the lack of information on this matter in the Government’s report. The Committee observes that the National Plan of Action for the Elimination of Child Labour 2015–20 (PANETE–RIM) identifies the presence of child victims of trafficking in Mauritania, including children who are victims of the vestiges of slavery, talibé children and foreign children (paragraph 2.4). The Committee requests the Government to step up its efforts to ensure that, in practice, children under 18 years of age are protected against the sale and trafficking of children for sexual or labour exploitation. Furthermore, the Committee again requests the Government to provide information on the application of Act No. 025/2003 of 17 July 2003 concerning the suppression of trafficking in persons, including statistics on the number and nature of reported violations, investigations, prosecutions, convictions and criminal penalties imposed.

2. Forced or compulsory labour. Begging. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that section 42(1) of Ordinance No. 2005-015 concerning the protection of children under criminal law provides that any person who causes a child to beg or directly employs a child to beg shall be liable to imprisonment of one to six months and a fine of 100,000 Mauritanian
The Committee notes the Government’s indications that a survey conducted in Nouakchott in 2013 reveals that begging affects 3.57 per cent of children between 3 and 5 years of age, 5.95 per cent of children of 6 or 7 years of age, 14.29 per cent of children between 9 and 11 years of age, 27.38 per cent of children between 12 and 14 years of age and 9.25 per cent of children aged 15. The survey also shows that 90 per cent of child beggars are male and 61 per cent of children state that they are instructed to beg by their marabout (religious teacher). According to the PANETE–RIM, talibé children are exposed to dangers, spending most of their time on the streets and often unable to return home empty-handed since they will otherwise receive a beating from their master (paragraph 2.4). The Committee also observes that the particular situation of talibé children will be taken into account in the context of preventive actions and measures under objective 4.2 of the PANETE–RIM. However, the Committee notes that there is no information on the investigation and prosecution of marabouts. The Committee reiterates that, under the terms of Article 7(1) of the Convention, the Government must take all necessary steps to ensure the effective implementation and enforcement of the provisions giving domestic service and are particularly vulnerable to exploitation.

The Committee notes the information from the Government to the effect that, as a result of the national child protection system established at the Ministry of Social Affairs, Children and the Family, a total of 5,084 out-of-school working children and child beggars have been placed in schools in the wilayas (regions) of Nouakchott, Dakhlet Nouadhibou and Assaba. However, the Committee notes the persistent presence of children engaging in begging, according to the analysis of the child labour situation in Mauritania (World Report on Child Labour 2015, table 13, page 39), produced jointly by the Government and ILO–IPEC. The Committee requests the Government to continue providing information on the number of child victims of begging who have been removed from the streets and rehabilitated and integrated into society, particularly by the Centre for the Protection and Social Integration of Children (CPISE) or by the Ministry of the Interior. The Committee also requests the Government to institute any other effective time-bound measures taken to identify talibé children who are forced to beg, and to remove them from such situations, ensuring their rehabilitation and social integration.

Clause (e). Special situation of girls. Domestic work. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the Government’s statement that most girls engaged in domestic work received little or no schooling. The Committee noted the CGTM’s allegations that domestic work involves a daily workload of heavy chores for children, who are subjected to abuse from a very young age. Furthermore, the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) indicated that many girls are forced into unpaid domestic service and are particularly vulnerable to exploitation.

The Committee notes that the Government provides no information on this matter in its report. However, the Committee notes the information contained in the PANETE–RIM, according to which child domestic workers account for 17.28 per cent of children covered by the survey and work more than 16 hours per day. The Plan of Action also mentions that most of these workers are girls who do not attend school and who work hidden from view, experiencing various problems, including abuse and rape and also unpaid wages (paragraph 2.4). The Committee also observes that, according to the 2015 survey relating to the legislative and institutional analysis of child labour in Mauritania, produced jointly by the Government and the ILO, domestic work is traditionally done by the daughters of former slaves and resembles the work previously done by their own enslaved mothers. The survey adds that girl domestic workers are systematically kept in poverty and most of them face abuse, exploitation and violence (page 8). The Committee is bound to express its concern at the situation of girl domestic workers. It reminds the Government that girls employed in domestic work are children engaged in the worst forms of child labour and are difficult to monitor their conditions of employment because of the hidden nature of their work. It also reminds the Government that, under the terms of Article 1 of the Convention, every member State must take immediate and effective measures to secure the prohibition and elimination of the worst forms of child labour as a matter of urgency. The Committee therefore urges the Government to take effective and time-bound measures to ensure that children who are victims of exploitation in domestic work are removed from this worst form of child labour and are rehabilitated and integrated into society, particularly as part of the PANETE–RIM. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on progress made in this regard.

Application of the Convention in practice. Further to its previous comments, the Committee observes that, according to the 2015 report on child labour, children work in sectors including mechanical engineering, fishing, agriculture, herding, small-scale commerce, as domestic workers or cart drivers. Moreover, the children work in hazardous conditions that are likely to harm their health, with most of them working on the streets and for long hours. The Committee notes that: child cart drivers are particularly exposed to traffic accidents; child dockers transport heavy loads that are harmful to their health; children are exposed to serious risks in mechanical engineering, including from the explosion and the maintenance of engines in garages; children in rural areas are exposed to the sun; some girls working in hotels and restaurants have been victims of rape; and children generally work the whole day without a break (pages 21–22). Furthermore, according to the PANETE–RIM, child shepherds under 10 years of age who take care of livestock wake early, go to bed late and work more than 16 hours per day exposed to dangers connected with that activity (paragraph 2.4). The Committee expresses its concern at the situation of children engaged in the worst forms of child labour, including hazardous work in Mauritania. The Committee urges the Government to take immediate and effective measures to ensure protection in practice for these children against the worst forms of child labour, particularly as part of the implementation of the PANETE–RIM. It also requests the Government to provide statistics on the nature, extent and trends of the worst forms of child labour, particularly in the informal economy. All information provided should, as far as possible, be disaggregated by sex and age.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.
Morocco

Article 2(1) of the Convention. Minimum age for admission to employment or work and application of the Convention in practice. 1. Children working in informal artisanal activities and other sectors. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that, according to the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), child labour was common in informal artisanal activities. It also noted that, according to the report entitled “Understanding Children’s Work in Morocco”, 7 per cent of children between 7 and 14 years of age were engaged in work, while 18 per cent of children were economically active in the 12 to 14 age group. According to this study, 87 per cent of working children were in rural areas, where they worked in agriculture. The Committee also observed that, under section 4 of the Labour Code, children employed in informal artisanal activities, or formal artisanal activities involving five employees or fewer, do not enjoy the protection of the Labour Code and, consequently, do not benefit from the application of the minimum age of 15 years for admission to employment or work. The Committee noted that, according to the survey of children’s work in small agricultural undertakings in Morocco (2014), the average age of children working in small agricultural undertakings was 14.3 years, with the over-15 age group accounting for nearly 57 per cent of the total and the under 12 age group for 10 per cent. It further noted that the average school dropout age was 13 years. The Committee noted with interest the Government’s statement that the bill concerning conditions of work and employment in activities of a purely traditional nature (bill on traditional activities), which prohibits work for children under 15 years of age in this sector in accordance with sections 143 and 153 of the Labour Code, was examined by the Council of the Government on 25 December 2014.

The Committee notes the Government’s indication in its report that the bill on traditional activities has been amended to incorporate new protectionist provisions which are favourable to workers in the sector and that it was referred to the Secretariat-General of the Government on 7 June 2018. The Committee also notes that, according to the quarterly employment survey of the Office of the High Commissioner for Planning, a total of 46,662 children under 15 years of age were engaged in work in the third quarter of 2017 and over 88 per cent of them were working in rural areas. The Committee further notes that the United Nations Human Rights Committee, in its concluding observations of December 2016, expressed concern at the continued economic exploitation of children, particularly in agriculture (CCPR/C/MAR/CO/6, paragraph 47). The Committee recalls that the Convention applies to all sectors of economic activity and all forms of employment or work, including the artisanal and agricultural informal economy. The Committee expresses the firm hope that the bill concerning conditions of work and employment in activities of a purely traditional nature will be adopted in the very near future and requests the Government to send a copy when it has been adopted. It requests the Government to continue its efforts to combat child labour, especially in the artisanal and agricultural sectors, and to provide information on the implementation of any project in this regard and the results achieved.

2. Child domestic workers. As regards the issue of child domestic labour, the Committee requests the Government to refer to its detailed comments on the Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182).

Article 9(1). Penalties. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that section 151 of the Labour Code provides that the employment of a child under 15 years of age, in breach of section 143 of the Labour Code, shall be punishable by a fine of 25,000–30,000 dirhams (MAD) (US$3,000–3,600), and that a repeat offence is subject to a term of imprisonment of six days to three months and/or a fine of MAD50,000–60,000 (US$6,000–7,200). It nevertheless noted that sections 150 and 183 of the Labour Code provide for a fine of MAD300–500 (US$36–60) for breaches of sections 147 and 179 of the Labour Code (prohibiting the employment of children under 18 years of age in hazardous work, in quarries or mines, or in work likely to hamper their growth). The Committee noted with regret the lack of information on any legislative amendments relating to penalties for violations of the ban on employing children under 18 years of age in hazardous work. Furthermore, the Committee noted that, before resorting to penalties, labour inspectors must give advice and information to employers on the dangers to which child workers are exposed. Under sections 542 and 543 of the Labour Code, a labour inspector who detects a violation of the safety and health provisions or regulations that poses an imminent risk to the workers’ health or safety shall issue an order requiring the employer to take all the necessary measures immediately. It is only if the employer refuses or fails to comply with the requirements of the order that the labour inspector shall immediately refer the matter to the court of first instance, where the employer may be given a deadline for taking all necessary steps to prevent the imminent danger and may order the closure of the establishment and determine, where appropriate, the necessary duration of the closure. The Committee observed that persons who have employed children in breach of the provisions giving effect to the Convention are not generally prosecuted if such employment is brought to an end.

The Committee notes the Government’s indications that in 2017 labour inspectors carried out 684 inspections in which they made 2,306 observations and issued 43 compliance notices. The Government indicates that, out of 85 working children under 15 years of age, 70 were removed from work and, out of 542 children between 15 and 18 years of age engaged in hazardous work, 158 were removed from such work. The Committee notes with regret that the Government has not sent any information on the number of persons prosecuted and the penalties imposed on persons violating provisions giving effect to the Convention. Furthermore, the Committee notes with concern that despite the fact that it has been raising this issue since 2005, the penalties for violating the prohibition on the employment of children under 18 years of age for a fine of 25,000–30,000 dirhams (MAD) (US$3,000–3,600), and that a repeat offence is subject to a term of imprisonment of six days to three months and/or a fine of MAD50,000–60,000 (US$6,000–7,200). It nevertheless noted that sections 150 and 183 of the Labour Code provide for a fine of MAD300–500 (US$36–60) for breaches of sections 147 and 179 of the Labour Code (prohibiting the employment of children under 18 years of age in hazardous work, in quarries or mines, or in work likely to hamper their growth). The Committee noted with regret the lack of information on any legislative amendments relating to penalties for violations of the ban on employing children under 18 years of age in hazardous work. Furthermore, the Committee noted that, before resorting to penalties, labour inspectors must give advice and information to employers on the dangers to which child workers are exposed. Under sections 542 and 543 of the Labour Code, a labour inspector who detects a violation of the safety and health provisions or regulations that poses an imminent risk to the workers’ health or safety shall issue an order requiring the employer to take all the necessary measures immediately. It is only if the employer refuses or fails to comply with the requirements of the order that the labour inspector shall immediately refer the matter to the court of first instance, where the employer may be given a deadline for taking all necessary steps to prevent the imminent danger and may order the closure of the establishment and determine, where appropriate, the necessary duration of the closure. The Committee observed that persons who have employed children in breach of the provisions giving effect to the Convention are not generally prosecuted if such employment is brought to an end.

Furthermore, the Committee notes with concern that despite the fact that it has been raising this issue since 2005, the penalties for violating the prohibition on the employment of children under 18 years of age for a fine of 25,000–30,000 dirhams (MAD) (US$3,000–3,600), and that a repeat offence is subject to a term of imprisonment of six days to three months and/or a fine of MAD50,000–60,000 (US$6,000–7,200). The Committee observed that persons who have employed children in breach of the provisions giving effect to the Convention are not generally prosecuted if such employment is brought to an end.
of age in hazardous work still do not constitute an adequate deterrent to ensure the application of the provisions of the Convention concerning hazardous work. The Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that all persons who employ children under 18 years of age in hazardous work are prosecuted and incur penalties that constitute an effective and adequate deterrent, in accordance with Article 9(1) of the Convention and in line with the more severe penalties envisaged in section 151 of the Labour Code. The Committee also requests the Government to provide information on the type of violations of the Convention detected by the labour inspection services, the number of persons prosecuted for each type of violation and the penalties imposed, particularly in relation to the provisions giving effect to the Convention.

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 2001)

Articles 3(a) and (d) and 7(1) of the Convention. Forced or compulsory labour, hazardous work and penalties.

Child domestic labour. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the statement by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) that child domestic labour, performed under conditions of servitude, is common practice in the country, with parents selling their children, sometimes as young as 6 years of age, to work as domestic servants. The Committee noted that section 10 of the Labour Code prohibits forced labour and that section 467-2 of the Penal Code prohibits the forced labour of children under 15 years of age. It further noted that a bill concerning domestic work, fixing the minimum age for this type of employment at 16 years, was in the process of being adopted. The Government indicated that a specific list determining hazardous types of work prohibited in the domestic work sector had been drawn up and would be circulated for approval after promulgation of the abovementioned bill. Furthermore, an initial survey of girl domestic workers indicated a total of nearly 23,000 girls under 18 years of age engaged in domestic work in the Greater Casablanca area, 59.2 per cent of whom were under 15 years of age. The survey revealed that many of these girls were victims of abuse. The Committee noted with concern the observation of the United Nations Committee on the Rights of the Child (CRC) that the authorities had not taken sufficient measures to remove girls, some only 8 years old, from households where they are employed as domestic workers in precarious conditions. The Committee urged the Government to take the necessary steps to ensure that the abovementioned bill and the list of hazardous types of domestic work were adopted as a matter of urgency.

The Committee notes with satisfaction the adoption of Act No. 19-12 fixing the conditions of work and employment of male and female domestic workers. The Government refers in its report to the adoption of two implementing decrees, specified in sections 3 and 6 of the aforementioned Act, which establish, respectively, the standard employment contract for domestic workers and the list of hazardous types of work prohibited for domestic workers aged between 16 and 18 years. Activities prohibited for children include the use of chemicals and electric cutting tools or machines which may present a risk to the safety and health of domestic employees, and work which may expose domestic workers to health risks because of contact with persons suffering from contagious diseases.

The Committee notes that section 6 of Act No. 19-12 fixes the minimum age for admission to employment as a domestic worker at 18 years. The aforementioned section provides for a transition period of five years during which children between 16 and 18 years of age may be employed as domestic workers further to written permission from their guardians. Section 7 of the Act prohibits forced labour involving domestic workers. Under section 23 of the Act, persons who infringe sections 6 and 7 are liable to a fine of 25,000–30,000 Moroccan dirhams (MAD) (US$3,000–3,600) and, in the case of a repeat offence, a fine of double the amount and/or three months’ imprisonment. The Committee further notes that the United Nations Human Rights Committee, in its concluding observations of December 2016, expressed concern at the continued economic exploitation of children, particularly as domestic workers (CCPR/C/MAR/CO/6, paragraph 47). While noting the Government’s efforts to regulate domestic work, the Committee reminds the Government that, under Article 3(a) and *d) of the Convention, work done by young persons under 18 years of age under conditions similar to slavery or under hazardous conditions constitutes one of the worst forms of child labour and, under Article 1, must be eliminated as a matter of urgency.

The Committee therefore requests the Government to continue its efforts to combat child domestic labour, particularly by ensuring that Act No. 19-12 fixing the conditions of work and employment of male and female domestic workers is applied in practice, and that penalties constituting an effective deterrent are imposed in practice on any individuals who subject children under 18 years of age to domestic work in hazardous or abusive conditions. It requests the Government to provide information on the number and nature of reported offences, the number of prosecutions and the penalties imposed.

Article 3(a). Trafficking of children. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that there was no national legislation relating to the trafficking of children. It also noted the CRC’s observation that Morocco remains a country of origin, destination and transit for children, who are subjected to forced labour, particularly as domestic workers, and also to trafficking for sexual exploitation and forced begging, two-thirds of trafficking victims being children. The Committee further noted that the 2015 study on the trafficking of women and children in Morocco, produced jointly by UN Women, Morocco and the Swiss Confederation, refers to the existence of forced labour for boys in craft work and agriculture and also of trafficking for sexual exploitation in the form of prostitution or pornography. The Committee asked the Government to take the necessary steps to ensure the adoption of legislation prohibiting the trafficking of children.
ELIMINATION OF CHILD LABOUR AND PROTECTION OF CHILDREN AND YOUNG PERSONS

The Committee notes with interest the adoption of Act No. 27-14 concerning action against trafficking in persons, promulgated by Dahir No. 1-16-104 of 18 July 2016, under which the definition of exploitation includes all forms of sexual exploitation, particularly exploitation of the prostitution of third parties and exploitation in the form of pornography, including through electronic communication media, and also exploitation in the form of forced labour, servitude, begging, slavery or similar practices, and exploitation in armed conflicts (section 448.1). The Committee notes that, under section 448.4, traffickers of persons are liable to imprisonment of 20–30 years and a fine of MAD200,000 to MAD2 million (US$21,000–210,000) when the victims are young persons under 18 years of age. The Government indicates that the Act contains provisions relating to institutional measures and provides for the setting up of a national advisory committee whose mandate is to put forward proposals on combating trafficking of persons and to ensure that the necessary steps are taken to support projects run by associations providing assistance for victims.

However, the Committee notes that, according to the report on the work and recommendations of the July 2017 study day on the institutional framework for combating human trafficking, Morocco continues to be a country of origin, transit, and destination for the trafficking of children for labour or sexual exploitation and domestic servitude. The report emphasizes that Morocco has become a country of transit for many migrants originating from sub-Saharan Africa and Asia, who are at special risk of becoming victims of trafficking networks. While noting the efforts made by the Government to combat trafficking in persons, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the application in practice of Act No. 27-14 concerning action against trafficking in persons, indicating in particular the number of child victims of trafficking, disaggregated by gender and age, and the number and nature of prosecutions and penalties imposed.

Article 7(2). Effective and time-bound measures. Clauses (a) and (b). Preventing the engagement of children in the worst forms of child labour and removing them from these worst forms, and ensuring their rehabilitation and social integration. Child prostitution and sex tourism. In its previous comments, the Committee expressed concern at the persistence of child prostitution and sex tourism involving young Moroccans and immigrants, particularly boys, despite the amendment to the Penal Code in 2003 making sex tourism a criminal offence. It noted the Government’s indications that the scourge of the sexual exploitation of children remains unseen and unrecognized in Morocco, and so the Government is making every effort to tackle it. Moreover, the CRC, in its concluding observations of 2014, expressed concern at the growth of sex tourism in Morocco. The Committee also noted that, in the 2011 mid-term evaluation of the National Action Plan for Children 2006–15 (PANE), the Government indicated that PANE had recorded significant progress in the protection of child victims of sexual exploitation, by establishing new public structures for the protection of child victims of sexual violence, including care units in courts and hospitals, support units within the Directorate-General for National Security, guidance and support units in schools, the ONDE telephone helpline and child reception areas in police stations. In this context, the Committee noted that five child protection units (UPEs) were set up between 2007 and 2010 in Marrakech, Casablanca, Tangier, Meknès and Essaouira to ensure better medical, psychological and legal assistance for child victims of violence and mistreatment, including sexual and economic exploitation, and that hundreds of children have benefited. The Government indicated that it had established an integrated public child protection policy in 2013, which included the objective of protecting children from sexual exploitation.

The Committee notes the Government’s indication that the “Integrated public policy for the protection of children in Morocco 2015–25 (PPIPM)”, adopted on 3 June 2015, comprises five strategic objectives, including: (i) strengthening the legal framework for child protection and making it more effective; (ii) establishing regional integrated child protection mechanisms; and (iii) setting up information, follow-up/evaluation and monitoring systems. The Government refers to the setting up of a programme for the rehabilitation of the UPEs, developed by the Ministry for the Family, Solidarity, Equality and Social Development (MFSEDS) in collaboration with the National Assistance Agency and associations with expertise in this field, in order to reinforce structures for the social protection of children and improve the quality of care for children in difficult situations. In 2016, three new UPEs were set up in Salé, Taza and Agadir. The Committee notes that the Government does not provide any information on the number of children prevented from engaging in commercial sexual exploitation or removed from it by the UPEs. The Committee requests the Government to continue its efforts to combat the commercial sexual exploitation of children. It also requests the Government to send information on the implementation of the integrated public child protection policy with regard to sexual exploitation and also information on the number of children prevented from engaging in commercial sexual exploitation or removed from it by the UPEs.

Clause (d). Children at special risk. Child domestic labour. The Committee previously noted the adoption of the “National programme to combat the use of young girls in domestic work (INQAD)” as part of the National Action Plan for Children. It also noted the results achieved through the ILO–IPEC–PAMODEC project, particularly the training of 50 labour inspectors in the area of child labour with a specific component on child domestic labour, three regional information and consultation meetings with the relevant stakeholders aimed at establishing a process for the preparation of regional plans to combat domestic labour, six training sessions on child domestic labour for educators and social facilitators in non-governmental organizations (NGOs), participation and consultation on the bill concerning domestic workers, the implementation of two action programmes against child domestic labour involving young girls in the regions of Rabat/Salé and Marrakech/Safi in support of the AMESIP and Al Karam associations (providing aid for children in precarious situations).
The Committee notes the Government’s indications that financial support from the Government in 2017 enabled associations to develop projects, inter alia, to reduce child domestic labour involving young girls, while also taking action to reduce the school dropout rate. Even though the Government indicates that, in 2016, a total of 286 children under 15 years of age were removed from work and 271 children between 15 and 18 years of age were removed from hazardous work, including young girl domestic workers, the Committee notes the lack of information regarding the number of girls removed from domestic work in particular. The Committee encourages the Government to step up its efforts to identify, remove and reintegrate girls under 18 years of age who are employed in domestic work and are victims of economic or sexual exploitation, and requests it to provide information on the results achieved with respect to domestic work involving young girls.

Article 2(1) of the Convention. Scope of application and labour inspection. 1. Children working in the informal economy. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that pursuant to sections 1 and 2 of Labour Law No. 23/2007, this Law only applies in the context of a labour relationship. In this regard, the Committee noted the Government’s statement in its report to the United Nations Committee on the Rights of the Child (CRC) that informal trade is one of the most common forms of labour in which children are involved in Mozambique (CRC/C/MOZ/2, paragraph 356). It also noted from the concluding observations of the CRC that child labour remained a common practice on commercial cotton, tobacco and tea plantations and on family farms where children may, for example, herd livestock (CRC/C/MOZ/CO/2, paragraph 79). Moreover, according to the Multiple Indicators Cluster Survey (MICS) report, 25 per cent of children were engaged in child labour in rural areas, compared to 15 per cent in urban areas.

The Committee notes the Government’s information that although the general labour inspectorate deals with the formal economy, children engaged in activities in the informal economy are protected through measures that include access to basic social assistance and free education. The Committee notes the information contained in a UNICEF publication of 2016, entitled “Child and Social Protection—Current Situation”, that 22 per cent of children aged 5–14 years are engaged in labour primarily in the agricultural and domestic work sectors. The Committee requests the Government to continue to take the necessary measures to ensure that the protection afforded by the Convention is guaranteed to children working in the informal economy, including through the basic social assistance and free education programmes. It also requests the Government to provide information on the impact of these measures in preventing child labour in the informal economy. Moreover, referring to paragraph 343 of the General Survey of 2012 on the fundamental Conventions, which states that child labour in the informal economy can be addressed through monitoring mechanisms, including through labour inspection, the Committee encourages the Government to take the necessary measures to strengthen the capacity and expand the reach of the labour inspectorate services to better monitor children working in rural areas, particularly in the agricultural sector as well as in the domestic work sector. It requests the Government to provide information on specific measures taken in this regard, as well as on the results achieved.

2. Domestic work. The Committee previously noted section 4(2) of the Regulations on Domestic Work (Decree No. 40/2008) which prohibits domestic work by children under 15 years of age, while permitting children of 12 years of age to be hired for domestic work with the permission of a legal representative. The Committee urged the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that no child under the age of 15 years is permitted to engage in domestic work, except under the specific conditions laid down in Article 7 of the Convention for light work.

The Committee notes the Government’s statement that this issue will be considered during the review of the Labour Law. The Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure the revision of the Labour Law, without delay, whereby children under 15 years of age are permitted to be engaged in domestic work, only as an exception based on specific conditions laid down in Article 7 of the Convention for light work. It requests the Government to provide information on any progress made in this regard.

Article 2(3). Age of completion of compulsory schooling. The Committee previously noted that the age of completion of compulsory schooling (13 years) was two years below the minimum age for admission to employment or work (15 years). The Committee accordingly urged the Government to take the necessary measures to raise the age of completion of compulsory education to 15 years so as to coincide with that of the minimum age for admission to employment or work.

The Committee notes with interest the Government’s indication that the revised National Education System Act makes it compulsory to attend school until the completion of ninth grade, whereas earlier it was until the completion of seventh grade. The Committee requests the Government to provide a copy of the revised National Education System Act which establishes compulsory education up to ninth grade.

Article 3(2). Determination of hazardous types of employment or work. In its previous comments, the Committee expressed the firm hope that the Government would take the necessary measures to develop and adopt a national list of types of hazardous work prohibited for persons under the age of 18 years, in accordance with Article 3(2) of the Convention.

The Committee notes with satisfaction that the List of Work considered Hazardous for Children Decree No. 67 of 2017 has been adopted. According to section 1 of this Decree, children under the age of 18 years shall not be employed in prohibited types of work and activities which, by their nature, are harmful to their mental, physical, social and moral development. The list of hazardous types of work as listed in the Annex to the Decree include: work in agriculture, fish farming and forestry; fishing sector; mining and extracting; manufacturing industry; production and distribution of electricity, gas and water; construction; trade and commercial sector; transport and storage; health and social services; domestic services; work in the streets; and other work involving exposure to varied temperatures, ionizing and radioactive substances, repetitive movements, and work in confined spaces. Section 3 further lays down the penalties of fines amounting to five to ten times the minimum wage for any violations of the provisions of the Decree. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the application in practice of sections 1 and 3 of the Decree No. 67 of 2017, including statistics on the number and nature of violations reported and penalties imposed.

Article 7(1) and (3). Minimum age for admission to light work and determination of light work. The Committee previously noted that, by virtue of section 21(1) of the Labour Law, an employment contract entered into directly with a minor between 12 and 15 years of age shall only be valid with the written authorization of the minor’s legal representative. It also noted that, under section 26(2) of the Labour Law, the Council of Ministers shall issue a legal authorization establishing the nature and the conditions of work that may be performed, in exceptional circumstances, by minors of between 12 and 15 years of age. In this regard, the Committee had recalled that, pursuant to Article 7(1) of the Convention, national laws or regulations may only permit the employment or work of persons of 13 to 15 years of age on light work, provided that such work is not likely to harm their health or development, or prejudice their attendance at school, their participation in vocational orientation or training programmes approved by the competent authority or their capacity to benefit from the instruction received. It also reminded the Government that, pursuant to Article 7(3) of the Convention, the competent authority shall determine what constitutes light work and shall prescribe the number of hours during which, and the conditions in which, such employment or work may be undertaken. Noting once again an absence of information on these points in the Government’s report, the Committee once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures to bring the Labour Law into conformity with Article 7(1) of the Convention by permitting children only from the age of 13 years to be engaged in light work. It also requests the Government to take the necessary measures to regulate this work by determining the types of light work activities permitted for children between the ages of 13 and 15 years, including the hours during which, and the conditions in which, such employment or work may be undertaken.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Article 3 of the Convention. Worst forms of child labour. Clause (b). Use, procuring or offering of a child for prostitution, pornography or pornographic performances. The Committee previously noted that the national legislation does not prohibit the use, procuring or offering of a person under 18 years for prostitution, the production of pornography or for pornographic performances. The Committee urged the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure the adoption of legislation prohibiting the use, procuring and offering of a person under 18 years of age for prostitution, for the production of pornography or for pornographic performances in accordance with Article 3(b) of the Convention, as a matter of urgency.

The Committee notes with interest the Government’s information that the use of children under the age of 18 years for prostitution and for the production of pornography or for pornographic performances is prohibited in accordance with Decree No. 67/2017 on the List of Work Considered Hazardous for Children. The Committee notes, however, that the sanctions prescribed under section 3(1) and (2) of the Decree concern only fines (amounting to five or ten times the minimum wage for that activity, and ten to 20 times the minimum wage for the offences related to the worst forms of child labour). In this regard, the Committee refers to Paragraph 12 of Recommendation No. 190 which provides that member States should provide that the worst forms of child labour, such as the use, procuring or offering of a child for prostitution, for the production of pornography or for pornographic performances, are criminal offences. The Committee, therefore, requests the Government to ensure that appropriate criminal penalties which constitute an effective deterrent are established for the offences related to the use, procuring or offering of a child for prostitution and for the production of pornography or for pornographic performances. The Committee asks the Government to provide information on the measures taken in this regard.

Clause (d). Hazardous work. Children in domestic work. The Committee previously noted that section 4(2) of the Regulations on Domestic Work (No. 40) of 2008, prohibits employers from employing a person under 15 years of age in domestic work. It observed, however, that these Regulations did not address the issue of hazardous domestic work by children. In this regard, the Committee noted that children, particularly young girls, engaged in domestic work, were often victims of exploitation, worked in dangerous situations up to 15 hours a day and were subject to physical abuse. Noting with concern the situation of children working as domestic workers, the Committee urged the Government to take immediate and effective measures to protect these children from hazardous types of work.
The Committee notes with satisfaction that domestic work is one of the types of activities listed in Decree No. 67/2017 on the List of Work Considered Hazardous for Children and which is prohibited to children under the age of 18 years. The Decree lists certain domestic activities that are hazardous to children under 18 years, such as: long hours of work; night work; garden work with sharp objects; exposure to adverse climatic conditions; use of agro-toxic substances; work in inappropriate postures; and work in isolation and out of public view. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the application in practice of Decree No. 67 of 2017, including the number of violations, investigations and penalties applied in relation to the employment of children under 18 years in hazardous domestic work.

Article 4(1). Determination of hazardous types of work. With regard to this point, the Committee requests the Government to refer to its detailed comments under the Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138).

Article 7(2). Effective and time-bound measures. Clause (d). Reaching out to children at special risk. Orphans and other vulnerable children. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the efforts taken by the Government to enhance the protection of vulnerable children such as: the Basic Social Assistance Programme and the National Basic Social Security Strategy (ENSSB) which aims to provide financial assistance to households who have members who are not fit to work or who have orphaned children. It also noted the significant number of children who had been benefiting from these programmes. Moreover, the Committee noted from the 2014 Global AIDS Response Progress Report for Mozambique (GARP Report) that since 2011 there had been a high level of political support for orphans and other vulnerable children and an increase in the number of interventions which produced positive results in terms of support and access to education of orphans and other vulnerable children. However, it noted from the UNAIDS estimates of 2014 that there were 610,000 children below the age of 17 years who had been orphaned due to AIDS.

The Committee notes that the Government’s report contains no information with regard to the measures taken to protect orphans and other vulnerable children from the worst forms of child labour. It notes that according to the latest data of the UNAIDS, 2017 an estimated 920,000 children under the age of 17 years are orphans due to AIDS in Mozambique. Recalling once again that orphans and other vulnerable children are at an increased risk of being engaged in the worst forms of child labour, the Committee urges the Government to intensify its efforts to ensure that such children are protected from the worst forms. It requests the Government to provide information on the effective and time-bound measures taken in this regard, and on the results achieved.

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 2013)

Article 3 of the Convention. Worst forms of child labour. Clause (a). All forms of slavery or practices similar to slavery. Compulsory recruitment of children for use in armed conflict. The Committee previously noted that the 1959 Defence Services Act (amended in 1974) and War Office Council Directive 13/73 of 1974 prohibit persons under the age of 18 from joining the armed forces. It also noted from the Report of the Secretary-General on Children and Armed Conflict of 5 June 2015 (A/69/926 S/2015/409) that a total of 357 cases of child recruitment and use by armed forces (Tatmadaw), including children as young as 14 years, were reported. Children were reported to be recruited by armed groups, including through abductions; into the formal ranks of the Tatmadaw; to the recruitment of children under 18 years by the armed forces and armed groups. The Committee further notes the information provided by the Government on the various training courses, awareness raising activities, including through newspapers and TV and radio broadcasts, and legal education provided to military personnel concerning the implementation of the joint plan of action for prevention of underage recruitment as well as the prohibition of forced recruitments. It further notes from the Government’s report under the Forced Labour Convention, 1930, (No. 29) that from 2007 to 2018, 754 cases, including 738 underage recruitment cases were received under the complaints mechanism of the Supplementary Understanding, of which 325 cases were closed by the ILO.

The Committee notes, however, that according to the Report of the Secretary General on Children and Armed Conflict of 16 May 2018 (A/72/865-S/2018/465), in 2017 the United Nations documented 428 cases of recruitment and use of children, the majority of cases being attributed to the Tatmadaw, including 166 cases of formal recruitment of children, some as young as 13 years, and the informal and temporary use of about 200 children, for maintenance and cleaning duties. Furthermore, the United Nations verified 39 cases of recruitment and use of children by armed groups (Kachin Independence Army and Ta’ang National Liberation Army), and the use of 53 boys by the Border Guard Police for camp maintenance, construction and carrying of equipment. The Committee finally notes from the Report of the Special Rapporteur on the situation of Human Rights in Myanmar of March 2018 that although cases of recruitment and use of child soldiers by the Tatmadaw had decreased from February 2013 to June 2017, a total of 856 complaints were verified by the UNCTFMR (A/HRC/37/70, paragraph 38). While noting some of the measures taken by the Government, the Committee must express its deep concern at the continued use and recruitment of children by armed forces and groups. The Committee therefore strongly urges the Government to take the necessary measures as a matter of urgency to ensure the full and immediate demobilization of all children and to put a stop, in practice, to the forced recruitment of children under 18 years of age into armed forces and groups. It also urges the Government to continue to take immediate and effective measures to ensure that thorough investigations and prosecutions of all persons, including military personnel and officials, who forcibly recruit children under 18 years of age for use in armed conflict, are carried out and that sufficiently effective and dissuasive penalties are imposed in practice. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken and the results achieved in this regard.

Sale and trafficking of children. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that according to section 24 of the Anti-Trafficking in Persons Law of 2005 (Anti-Trafficking Law), persons guilty of trafficking in children (persons under 16 years, section 3) and youth (persons between 16 and 18 years) shall be punished with imprisonment for a period from ten years to life imprisonment and a fine. The Committee requested the Government to provide information on the application in practice of these provisions of the Anti-Trafficking Law, including the number of investigations, prosecutions and convictions made with regard to the offences related to the trafficking of children and youth.

The Committee notes the Government’s information in its report that from 2012 to 2016, 120 cases of trafficking of children were reported and legal actions were instituted against 129 persons (54 males and 75 females), of which 85 persons were convicted with penalties of imprisonment ranging from five to 20 years. In addition, from 2017 to June 2018, 59 cases of trafficking of children were reported, leading to 40 prosecutions and 18 convictions with penalties of imprisonment ranging from 10 to 20 years. The Committee notes that the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW), in its concluding observations of 25 July 2016, expressed concern that the State party remained a source country for trafficking in persons, and that women and girls continued to be trafficked to neighbouring and other countries for sexual and labour exploitation. Girls as young as 12 and 15 years are trafficked for sexual exploitation and children (girls and boys) aged 11 years and older are trafficked for labour exploitation. The Committee therefore urges the Government to intensify its efforts to ensure in-depth investigations and prosecutions against persons who engage in the trafficking of children. It requests the Government to continue to provide information on the number of investigations, prosecutions, convictions and penalties imposed pursuant to section 24 of the Anti-Trafficking Law. It also requests the Government to provide information on the number of victims identified, rehabilitated and integrated, disaggregated by gender and age.

Clause (b). Use, procuring or offering of a child for pornography or pornographic performances. The Committee previously noted that section 66(f) of the Child Law No. 9/93 provides for penalties for the offence related to using of a child (defined as a person under 16 years of age (section 2)) in pornographic cinema, video or television photography. It also noted that according to section 27 of the Anti-Trafficking Law, any person who is guilty of making use of a victim of trafficking for the purpose of pornography shall be punished with imprisonment for a period of five to ten years and a fine. The Committee requested the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the prohibition on the use of children for pornographic activities covered all children under 18 years of age.

The Committee notes the Government’s information that the Child Law has been reviewed and the provisions under section 66(f) of the Child Law No. 9/93 and section 27 of the Anti-Trafficking Law have been amended in such a way so as to ensure the best interests of the child and have been inserted in the draft Child Law. The Government further indicates that this draft law is currently submitted to the Parliament. The Committee expresses the firm hope that the draft Child Law will contain provisions prohibiting the use, procuring or offering of all children under the age of 18 years for the production of pornography and for pornographic performances. It requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure the adoption of the draft Child Law, without delay and to provide information on any progress made in this regard.

Clause (c). Use, procuring or offering of a child for illicit activities, in particular for the production and trafficking of drugs. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that section 22(c) of the Narcotic Drugs and Psychotropic Substances Law of 1993 makes it an offence to use children under the age of 16 years in acts related to the production, distribution, transportation, importation and exportation of a narcotic drug or psychotropic substance. It also noted that section 66(c) of the Child Law provides for penalties for employing a child under 16 years of age for begging. Referring to Articles 3(c) and 2 of the Convention, the Committee requested the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the prohibition on the use of children for illicit activities, such as the production and trafficking of drugs or for begging covers all children under 18 years of age.

The Government’s report does not contain any information on this matter. The Committee therefore once again urges the Government to take the necessary measures, including within the framework of the revision of the Child Law, to ensure that the prohibition on the use of children for illicit activities, such as the production and trafficking of drugs or for begging covers all children under 18 years of age. It requests the Government to provide information on any progress made in this regard.

Clause (d) and Article 4(1) Hazardous work and determination of hazardous work. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that section 65(a) of the Child Law and section 75 of the draft Law amending the 1951 Factories Act which prohibit the employment of children in work which is hazardous or harmful to the child’s health and morals, apply only to persons under 16 years of age. It also noted the Government’s information that the draft Shops and Establishment Law contained a provision prohibiting the employment of children under 18 years of age in hazardous work or workplaces.

The Committee notes with interest that the Shops and Establishments Law, which was enacted in 2016, prohibits the employment of persons under the age of 18 years in dangerous work or workplaces (section 14(d)). The Committee further notes from the ILO–IPEC Technical Progress Report (TPR) of June 2018 on the Myanmar Programme on the Elimination of Child Labour (My-PEC project), that a list of types of hazardous work prohibited to children under 18 years has been developed and validated by the Technical Working Group on Child Labour (TWGCL) after tripartite and wide stakeholder consultations. The Committee expresses the firm hope that the draft list determining the types of hazardous work prohibited for persons under 18 years of age will be adopted in the near future. It requests the Government to provide information on any progress made in this regard. It also requests the Government to provide a copy, once it has been adopted.

Labour inspection and application of the Convention in practice. The Committee notes the Government’s information that some of the existing labour laws related to child labour, such as the Factories Act and the Shops and Establishments Act have been amended so as to bring them into line with ILO standards. Moreover, measures are also being undertaken to ensure occupational safety and health, welfare and legal rights of children who are working in factories, shops and establishments in accordance with the labour laws. The Committee also notes from the Government’s report that a Technical Working Group on Child Labour (TWG), which consists of 31 members from the relevant ministries, as well as representatives of the ILO, UNICEF, employers’ and workers’ organizations and international NGOs was established in 2014 to draw Operational Guidelines and Terms of Reference in line with the child labour Conventions. The Government indicates that the TWG conducted 20 sessions and 14 workshops on child labour, five events on the World Day against Child Labour and several awareness-raising activities in order to eliminate child labour. Moreover, various capacity building trainings, and training for trainers were provided to labour inspectors by the Occupational Authority of Denmark. The Committee further notes the Government’s information that from 2010 to until now, six persons were prosecuted for using child labour.

The Committee notes, however, that according to the 2015 Labour Force Survey Report, over 600,000 children among the 1.12 million children involved in child labour, are engaged in hazardous work, with 1.7 per cent in the age group of 5–11 years, 24.1 per cent in the age group of 12–14 years, and 74.6 per cent in the age group of 15–17 years. Key sectors where child labour occurs are agriculture, forestry and fishing; manufacture; wholesale and retail trade and repair of motor vehicles where children work for long hours, at night and in hazardous conditions. The Committee further notes from the ILO–IPEC document on Legal review of national laws and regulations related to child labour in Myanmar, Executive Summary, 2015 that law enforcement to fight child labour is very weak and remains a challenge in Myanmar, due to a number of reasons, including prevalence of work in the informal economy, general lack of legal awareness by employers and workers, lack of monitoring mechanisms and corruption. While noting some of the measures taken by the Government, the Committee must express its concern at the large number of children involved in hazardous work in Myanmar. The Committee therefore urges the Government to intensify its efforts to eliminate hazardous child labour, including through strengthening the capacity and expanding the reach of labour inspectors to detect hazardous child labour, particularly in the informal economy. It also requests the Government to provide information on the implementation of any measures taken in this regard as well as any statistical information collected on the number and nature of violations detected and sanctions imposed related to children engaged in hazardous work, disaggregated by gender, age and economic sector.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Nepal

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 1997)

Article 1 of the Convention. National policy and application of the Convention in practice. In its previous comments, the Committee noted from the report on the Annual Household Survey of Nepal 2013–14, that 29.4 per cent of children aged between 5 and 14 years were economically active, with a higher percentage of female children (33.9 per cent) than male children (25.3 per cent). Seventy per cent of the working children work for 20 hours or less per week, while 5.5 per cent work for 40 hours or more. Among working children, 76.5 per cent were engaged in agricultural work and 19.3 per cent in other work. The Committee also noted from the Trafficking in Persons National Report of the National Human Rights Commission of March 2016 that despite several programmes being implemented by the Government to prevent children from becoming involved in child labour and its worst forms, an average of 500,000 students enrolled in grades 1 to 10 dropped out of school each year in Nepal. The Committee further noted that the Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights (CESC), in its concluding observations of 12 December 2014, expressed concern at the high number of children under the minimum age who work in agriculture, quarries and mines, domestic servitude and pottery factories. The CESC also expressed concern at the weak enforcement of the legislation which prohibits child labour and the lack of information on the impact of awareness-raising campaigns conducted by the state party (E/C.12/NPL/CO/3, paragraph 21).

The Committee notes the Government’s information in its report, that the National Master Plan to end Child Labour which aims to eliminate all forms of child labour by 2026, has been approved and that specific action plans for its effective implementation are being drafted by the concerned ministries. The Government further indicates that the coverage of the labour and occupational safety and health inspectors have been expanded and a manual for labour inspection training on child labour has been developed. In this regard, it notes the Government’s information that from 2016 to 2017, the Department of Labour and Occupational Safety conducted child labour inspections in 220 enterprises. Moreover, the Government states that a new National Labour Force Survey has been conducted by the Central Bureau of Statistics and its report will be published by the end of 2018. The Committee further notes from the Technical Progress Report of the ILO–IPEC project entitled “Towards Achieving the Elimination of the Worst Forms of Child Labour as Priority (ACHIEVE)” that within the framework of this project, 14 wards in the four municipalities of Bhaktapur and Kavre districts were declared as child labour free.

The Committee notes however, that according to the information from the ILO document, “Child Labour in Nepal”, 1.6 million children between 5–17 years are still involved in child labour in Nepal, including 621,000 children who are engaged in hazardous work. It also notes from the final draft of the National Master Plan to end Child Labour that although child labour seems to have decreased in some areas, it has increased in the majority of areas and there has therefore not been a significant improvement in the overall child labour situation in the country. While noting some of the measures taken by the Government, the Committee must express its deep concern at the significant number of children under the minimum age who are engaged in child labour and in hazardous work in Nepal. The Committee therefore urges the Government to strengthen its efforts to ensure the elimination of child labour, including through the adoption and implementation of effective measures within the National Master Plan. It requests the Government to provide information on the concrete measures taken in this regard and the results achieved. The Committee also requests the Government to continue to provide information on the inspections carried out by the Labour and Occupational Safety and Health inspectors, and on the number and nature of violations concerning the employment of children recorded and the penalties imposed. Lastly, it requests the Government to provide information on the findings of the National Labour Force Survey pertaining to child labour, disaggregated by age and gender.

Article 2(1). Scope of application. Children working in the informal economy. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that the Child Labour (Prohibition and Regulation) Act of 2000 (Child Labour Act), which prohibits the employment of children below 14 years as labourers (section 3(1)), does not define the terms "employment" and "labourer". The Government indicated that the Act does not adequately cover the informal economy and that it is very difficult to enforce the provisions of the Convention in the informal economy due to limited infrastructure and financial resources. The Committee also noted from the report of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) for the World Trade Organization General Council on the Trade Policies that formal employment agreements accounted for only 10 per cent of all employment relationships, so the Child Labour Act does not apply to 90 per cent of employment relationships. This report further indicated that working children were mainly found performing informal economic activity in quarries and mines, domestic servitude, agriculture and portering. In this regard, the Committee noted the Government’s statement that the Labour Act of 1992, Children’s Act, 1992 and the Child Labour Act were being revised and that those draft laws stipulate that labour inspectors shall inspect all workplaces to identify child labour.

The Committee notes the Government’s statement in its report that the new Labour Act of 2017 has been adopted and enforced while the Children Act and Child Labour Act are still in the process of revision. It notes the Government’s information that the Labour Act guarantees the right of labour inspectors to inspect all workplaces, including the informal economy. The Committee notes that section 94(1)(g) of the Labour Act, which spells out the powers, functions and duties of labour inspectors, states that the labour inspector shall inspect and find out whether children are employed or not and if found employed, shall rescue them immediately and take action against the employer. The Government further indicates that a Training for Trainers programme was organized for labour inspectors in collaboration with the Office of the Attorney-General. This programme has led to better coordination among officials both with regard to legal procedures to be followed and penalties to be applied in cases of violations of labour law. The Committee strongly encourages the Government to continue its efforts to strengthen the capacity and expand the reach of the labour inspectorate so as to better monitor child labour, including in the informal economy. It requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken in this regard and on the results achieved.
Article 3(1) and (2). Minimum age for admission to hazardous work and determination of types of hazardous work. The Committee previously noted that sections 2(a) and 3(2) of the Child Labour Act prohibit the employment of persons under 16 years of age in any risky job or enterprise listed in the schedule, and that section 43(2) of the Labour Rules, 1993 prohibits the employment of persons under 16 years on dangerous machines and in operations which are hazardous to their health. It also noted that the Child Labour (Prohibition and Regulation) Act, 2000, listed different jobs, occupations and work environments that are hazardous and therefore prohibited to children below 16 years. The Committee further noted the Government’s indication that the draft Child Labour Act contained provisions prohibiting the employment of children under 18 years in hazardous work and that a draft list of types of hazardous work, which contains approximately 29 occupations and activities prohibited for children and minors, had been developed in consultation with the workers’ and employers’ organizations.

The Committee notes the Government’s indication that the list of types of hazardous work prohibited to children under 18 years has been finalized and is awaiting to be incorporated into the Child Labour Act, before adoption. The Committee expresses the firm hope that the Government will take the necessary measures to ensure that the list of types of hazardous work prohibited for children under 18 years of age will be adopted in the near future. It requests the Government to provide information on any progress made in this regard.

Article 3(3). Admission to types of hazardous work from the age of 16 years. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that the activities contained in the proposed list of hazardous work, appeared to be prohibited to children under 16 years, for example, any work related to: adventures and sports tourism; transportation of passengers and heavy goods; garment, handloom, power loom and embroidery; and household chores or domestic work.

The Committee notes the Government’s indication that the necessary measures will be taken to ensure that persons between 16 and 18 years will only be permitted to perform hazardous work if their health, safety and morals are fully protected and that they have received adequate training in that activity. The Committee expresses the firm hope that the Government will take the necessary measures to protect persons between 16 and 18 years who are engaged in hazardous types of work, as laid down under Article 3(3) of the Convention. It requests the Government to provide information on any progress made in this regard.

Articles 3(a) and 7(2)(b) of the Convention. Worst forms of child labour and time-bound measures to provide direct assistance for their removal and rehabilitation and social integration. Child bonded labour. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the Government’s information that the Kamlari (girls sold into indentured labour) system is prohibited under the Kamlari Prohibition Act of 2013. It also notes the various measures taken to eliminate the bonded labour of children and to provide for their rehabilitation, social reintegration and access to education. In this regard, it noted the implementation of the Kamlari Scholarship which provided financial assistance to a number of freed Kamlari girls as well as the provision of education and vocational training within the National Plan of Action Against Child Bonded Labour, 2009. It noted, however, that the Committee on the Rights of the Child (CRC), and the United Nations Human Rights Committee on the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (CCPR), in their concluding observations of 3 June 2016 (CRC/C/NPL/CO/3-5, paragraph 68) and 15 April 2014 (CCPR/C/NPL/CO/2, paragraph 18), respectively, expressed concern about the continuity of practices of bonded labour such as Haliya and Kamaiya (agricultural based bonded labour practice), and Kamlari in some regions of the State party. The Committee urged the Government to strengthen its efforts to ensure the complete elimination of bonded labour of children under 18 years of age and to pursue its efforts to ensure appropriate services for their rehabilitation and social integration, including access to education.

The Committee notes the Government’s information in its report, that the Ministry of Land Management and Poverty Alleviation has been implementing the Free Kamaiya and Haliya (bonded labour) Rehabilitation Programme through which grants are provided for purchasing land, building houses, and purchasing work as well as skills development training and resettlement programmes to victims of bonded labour. Accordingly, from 2017 to 2018, 37 families were provided financial support to purchase land; 876 families to purchase wood; and 1,005 families for building houses. Moreover, five skill development trainings were provided to 80 Kamaiyas and Haliyas. In addition, during the fiscal year 2016–17, the Ministry of Education, Science and Technology provided financial assistance to 1,611 freed Kamlari girls, through the Kamlari Scholarship Directives, to pursue their education until grade 12. The Committee strongly encourages the Government to continue its efforts to ensure that child victims of bonded labour receive appropriate services for their rehabilitation and social integration, including access to education. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on the measures taken in this regard and on the results achieved.

Article 3(b) and (c). Use, procuring or offering of a child for the production of pornography or for pornographic performances, and for the production and trafficking of drugs. The Committee previously observed that the prohibition on the use or involvement of children in an “immoral profession” under sections 2(a) and 16(1) of the Children’s Act, 1992, applies only to children under 16 years. It also noted that pursuant to sections 2(a) and 16(4) of the Children’s Act, children under 16 years are prohibited from being involved in the sale, distribution or trafficking of alcohol, narcotics or other drugs. The Committee further noted the Government’s information that the draft Children’s Act contained provisions prohibiting the use, procuring or offering of all children under 18 years for the production of pornography or for pornographic performances as well as for the production and trafficking of drugs.

The Committee notes the Government’s indication that the new Children’s Bill has been approved by the Cabinet and is currently being tabled in the Parliament for adoption. The Committee expresses the firm hope that the Children’s Bill which contains provisions prohibiting the use, procuring or offering of all children under 18 years of age for the production of pornography and for illicit activities, such as the production and trafficking of drugs, will be adopted in the near future. It requests the Government to provide information on any progress made in this regard and to provide a copy, once it has been adopted.

Articles 5 and 7(1). Monitoring mechanisms and penalties. Trafficking. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the Government’s information that a National Committee on Controlling Human Trafficking, District Committees on Controlling Human Trafficking in 75 districts and local committees in 109 villages were established for the effective implementation of the Human Trafficking and Transportation (Control) Act of 2007. It also noted that the Women and Children Service Directorate, under the Nepal Police, provided services to all the Women and Children Service Centres in dealing with cases relating to trafficking in persons. Moreover, the Nepal Police and the Central Child Welfare Board (CCWB) were also involved in rescuing trafficked children. The Committee noted, however, that the Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights (CESCR) and the CCPR, in their concluding observations of 2014, expressed concern at the high number of children who were trafficked for labour and sexual exploitation, as well as for begging and slavery, including in neighbouring countries; at the ineffective application of the Human Trafficking and Transportation (Control) Act and at the lack of information on investigations, prosecutions, convictions and sanctions imposed on traffickers (E/C.12/NPL/CO/3, paragraph 22; and CCPR/C/NPL/CO/2, paragraph 18). The Committee therefore urged the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that thorough investigations and prosecutions of persons engaged in the sale and trafficking of children under 18 years of age were carried out and that sufficiently effective and dissuasive penalties were imposed in practice.

The Committee notes the Government’s information that from 2015 to 2016: (i) 6,939 training programmes for stakeholders working against human trafficking were conducted, benefiting 37,632 trainees; (ii) interaction programmes with 167 stakeholders were conducted by the National and District Committees on Controlling Human Trafficking; and (iii) training programmes were provided to 486 officials from Nepal Police and District Courts. Moreover, a helpline for children and Human Trafficking and Control Unit under the Ministry of Women, Children and Senior Citizens were established.

The Committee notes from the Trafficking in Persons National Report of the National Human Rights Commission of June 2017 (Report of the NHRC) that the number of trafficking cases registered by the Nepal Police is relatively low compared to the factual number of trafficking victims. This report indicates that in 2015–16, a total of 212 cases of human trafficking, involving 352 victims, were registered, of which four in ten victims were children. In this regard, the Committee notes from the Report of the NHRC that as per the interventions and the rescue efforts of the Crime Investigation Division of Kathmandu, the Nepal Police and Foreign Embassies to Nepal, an estimated 23,200 victims of trafficking were registered in 2015–16, including 13,600 potential victims of trafficking of which 50 per cent were children. This report further indicates that by the end of June 2016, an estimated 44,131 children who were recorded as being at high risk due to the earthquake of 2015 were also vulnerable to trafficking. Moreover, the Committee notes that the CRC, in its concluding observations of June 2016, expressed concern about the 2015 earthquake which exacerbated the vulnerability of orphans, children of indigenous groups, religious minorities, the Dalit community and migrant workers to human trafficking (CRC/C/NPL/CO/3-5, paragraph 66). The Committee therefore urges the Government to strengthen its efforts to combat trafficking in children, including through the strengthening of the capacities of the National and District Committees on Controlling Human Trafficking, the Human Trafficking and Control Unit and the Nepal Police, to ensure the effective monitoring and identification of child victims of trafficking. It also requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that thorough investigations and prosecutions of persons engaged in the sale and trafficking of children under 18 years of age are carried out and that sufficiently effective and dissuasive penalties are imposed in practice. It requests the Government to provide information on the measures adopted in this respect and on the results achieved.

Articles 7(2). Effective and time-bound measures. Clause (a). Preventing the engagement of children in the worst forms of child labour. Access to free basic education. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the various measures taken by the Government to improve access of children to basic education, such as the scholarship support to children of disadvantaged and minority groups, and girls; the “Mid-Day Meal” programme; and the “Welcome to School” programme, which assists in reaching out to disadvantaged children in the rural areas. The Committee further noted from the 2013 Progress Report of the Millennium Development Goals that although the net enrolment rate (NER) at the primary level reached 95.3 per cent in 2013, the net attendance rate at primary level was only 68.8 per cent and that at least 4.7 per cent (over 800,000 children) of primary school-age children were still out of school. The Committee encouraged the Government to pursue its efforts to facilitate access to free basic education for all children, with a particular focus on children from disadvantaged minorities and other marginalized groups.
The Committee notes that the Government’s report does not provide any further information on the measures taken to improve the functioning of the education system. However, the Committee notes from the Report of the NHRC that the Ministry of Education (MoE) issued a Compulsory Basic Education Guideline 2014. According to this report, the MoE provided scholarships to more than 1.3 million children, of which the majority was for girls and Dalit children in grades 1–8. The Committee further notes from the UNESCO statistics that in 2017, the NER in primary education reached 94.7 per cent (girls: 93.25 and boys: 96.08) with a transition rate to secondary education at 82.38 per cent. Moreover, the NER in secondary education reached 55.29 per cent (girls: 57.26 and boys: 53.42). However, the UNESCO statistics further indicate that about 381,448 children and adolescents were still out of school in 2017. The Committee further notes that the CRC, in its concluding observations of July 2016, expressed concern at the high number of children who are out of school; the high drop-out rate of girls; the low enrolment and high drop-out rates of indigenous children; and the significant gaps in the quality of education between rural and urban areas (CRC/C/NPL/CO/3-5, paragraph 58).

Considering that access to education is one of the most effective means of preventing the engagement of children in the worst forms of child labour, the Committee requests the Government to strengthen its efforts to facilitate access to free and basic quality education for all children, with a particular focus on girls and indigenous children. It requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken in this regard and on the results achieved, particularly with regard to improving the functioning of the education system, increasing the school enrolment, attendance and completion rates, and reducing the school drop-out rates.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Netherlands

Aruba

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138)

The Committee notes that the Government’s report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments initially made in 2015.

Article 3(2) of the Convention. Determination of types of hazardous work. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the Government’s indication that the proposal to allow the Director of the Labour Department to determine the types of hazardous work was with the Department of Legislation for technical evaluation and revision. The Committee urged the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that, following the approval of the Department of Legislation, the Director of the Labour Department determines the types of hazardous work at the earliest possible date.

The Committee notes with satisfaction that the Government adopted Ministerial Decree No. 78 of 2013 which contains a list of types of hazardous work prohibited to young persons under the age of 18 years. This list comprises work involving lifting or pulling heavy weights; working continuously in the same position; work involving contact with toxic, carcinogenic, mutagenic substances as well as explosives, irritants or corrosive substances; work with wild, poisonous or dangerous animals; slaughtering of animals; work in establishments providing alcohol; work with or near dangerous machines or equipment involving fire, explosion, electrocution, bottlenecks, harvesting, cutting; work under water; work with devices that have harmful non-ionizing electromagnetic radiation; work with compressed gases; work exposing children to high noise and vibration; work in environments causing a risk of collapse; work near power lines; and work in hospitals. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken in this regard and on the results achieved, particularly with regard to improving the functioning of the education system, increasing the school enrolment, attendance and completion rates, and reducing the school drop-out rates.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

New Zealand

The Committee notes the observations of Business New Zealand and the New Zealand Council of Trade Unions (NZCTU), communicated with the Government’s report.

Articles 3(d) and 4(1) of the Convention. Hazardous work. Minimum age for admission to hazardous work. The Committee previously noted the Government’s indication that children under 18 years cannot work in any restricted areas of licensed premises such as bars, licensed restaurants or clubs. However, it noted that, by virtue of section 54(d) of the Health and Safety in Employment Regulations of 1995 (HSE Regulations), hazardous work was prohibited for children under 15 years of age. It further noted the Government’s statement that although according to the existing law, the specific legal restrictions on certain types of work were only applicable to children under the age of 15, children between the ages of 16 and 18 were protected by the general requirements of workplace health and safety legislation, which provides protection to all workers, regardless of age. The Committee also noted the reference made by the NZCTU to the findings of the Youth 2000 National Youth Health and Wellbeing Survey (Youth’12 survey), indicating the work-related accidents and injuries, some of which were fatal, caused to young persons under 18 years. Moreover, it noted the data of workplace fatalities from 2013 to 2015 of WorkSafe New Zealand, which indicated that of the 119 fatalities, 14 were children under the age of 18 with the majority occurring in the agricultural sector. The Committee recalled that Paragraph 4 of the Worst Forms of Child Labour Recommendation, 1999 (No. 190), addresses the possibility of authorizing the employment or work of young persons in certain types of hazardous work as from the age of 16 under strict conditions that their health and safety be protected and that they received adequate specific instruction or vocational training in the relevant branch of activity. In this regard, the Committee, referring to the 2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, paragraph 380, emphasized that measures should be taken to raise the minimum age for admission to hazardous work to 16 years, even if the required protective conditions were adequately provided.

The Committee notes the statement made by Business New Zealand that the statistics on workplace injuries and fatalities do not necessarily relate to the employment of children and young persons. On the contrary, in a number of instances the injured person was not an employee but someone present at the workplace to whom an accident occurred. It also notes the NZCTU’s statement that it maintains its previous comments as there has been no change in the position of the law.

The Committee notes from the Government’s report that the Health and Safety at Work Act 2015 (HSW Act) has been adopted and came into effect in April 2016 along with nine sets of supporting regulations on health and safety in specific sectors. The Committee observes that the HSW Act and some of its regulations apply to workers in general and do not contain any specific provisions for the health and safety of young workers while some others provide for specific restrictions on certain types of work for children under the age of 15 or 16 years. For example, sections 43–48 of the Health and Safety at Work (General Risk and Workplace Management) Regulations, 2016 (which amended the Health and Safety in Employment Regulations, 1995), require the person conducting a business or undertaking (PCBU) to ensure that no worker under the age of 15 years carries out or be present in any area of the workplace where: goods are manufactured or prepared for trade or sale; construction work is carried out; work related to logging or tree-felling is carried out; hazardous substances are manufactured, used or generated; or while night work is prohibited to persons under 16 years of age. Furthermore, workers under the age of 15 years shall not be required to lift heavy weights or perform other harmful tasks, or work at or with machinery. The Committee also notes the statistical information provided by the Accident Compensation Corporation which indicated that a total of 5,985 work related claims were recorded for persons between 15 and 18 years in 2016 and 6,448 such claims were recorded in 2017.

The Committee further notes the Government’s information that it is in the process of undertaking an extensive multi-year work programme to reform New Zealand’s health and safety system, aimed at reducing workplace injury and death by 25 per cent by 2020, recognizing that young workers are more vulnerable to health and safety risks. In this regard, the Committee notes with interest the Government’s statement that, within the framework of this reform, it is envisaged to review the regulatory frameworks for young persons in relation to hazardous work, while considering raising the current age for admission to hazardous work from 15 to 16 years and to assure the safety of young persons below 18 years by seeking to provide training and supervision for young persons of 16 years in high-risk work. The Committee expresses the firm hope that the Government will continue to take the necessary measures, without delay, to ensure that the current review of the regulatory frameworks for young persons will take into consideration relevant international standards, in particular Paragraph 4 of the Worst Forms of Child Labour Recommendation, 1999 (No. 190), relating to the requirement that employment or work as from the age of 16 be authorized on condition that the health, safety and morals of the children concerned are fully protected, and that the children have received adequate specific instruction or vocational training in the relevant branch of activity. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on any progress made in this regard.

Article 4(1) and (3). Periodic revision of the types of hazardous activities. In its previous comments, the Committee had noted that the report of the Department of Labour (DoL) entitled Schoolchildren in paid employment – A summary of research findings identified the construction, agriculture and hospitality industries as posing the most risk to young workers, as well as some other types of work which are dangerous to young persons by volume, such as working in shops (including petrol stations and supermarkets) and working in restaurants, takeaway outlets and other eateries. It also noted the statement made by the NZCTU, with reference to a report by the Child and Youth Mortality Review Committee of 2014, that hazardous work on farms, including riding and using quad bikes and agricultural machinery, must be restricted in the interests of the safety and welfare of children.

The Committee notes the Government’s information that as part of the review of the regulatory frameworks for young persons, types of hazardous work for young persons will be assessed and a revised list, including work in plants, work with machineries and vehicles (including tractors and quad bikes), will be established. The Government further indicates that the review will be carried out in consultation with the representative organizations of employers and workers and that the formal consultations are expected to begin by mid-2018. The Committee expresses the firm hope that the Government will take the necessary measures to ensure that the revision of the regulatory framework for young persons will result in the adoption of a concrete list of types of hazardous work prohibited to young persons, including work in plants, work with machineries and vehicles used for agricultural purposes as well as certain types of work in the agricultural, construction and hospitality industries, as identified by the report of the Department of Labour. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on any progress made in this regard.

Article 5. Monitoring mechanisms and application of the Convention in practice. Following its previous comments, the Committee notes the Government’s information that all work-related fatalities are investigated with the objective to establish the key facts relating to the cause of the event as well as to determine the immediate and underlying causes of the event, ensure action by the duty holder(s) concerned in order to prevent a recurrence of the event, and to determine any breach of the relevant law. The Committee notes from the Government’s report that according to the statistics from Worksafe New Zealand, nine incidents of work-related fatalities of children were notified from 2015 to the present including children from the age of 3 to 17 years. However, the Government states that these cases include not only children who are at work but also children present as bystanders in a workplace at the time of the incident. The Committee further notes the Government’s information that it is currently working towards the next Youth Health and Wellbeing Survey on the types of work, hours, employment conditions and workplace safety covering all children and young people.

The Committee expresses the firm hope that the Government will undertake the Youth Health and Wellbeing Survey in the near future, covering all children and young persons so as to better understand their working conditions and health and safety outcomes. It requests the Government to provide information on the results of the survey which, to the extent possible, should be disaggregated by age and gender.

Nicaragua

Article 2(3) of Convention. Age of completion of compulsory schooling. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that the 2006 Education Act provides that schooling is compulsory only up to the age of 12 years. The Committee requested the Government to take the necessary measures to match the age of completion of compulsory schooling with the minimum age for admission to employment or work, which is 14 years. It also requested the Government to pursue its efforts to raise the school attendance rate and reduce the school drop-out rate in order to prevent work by children under 14 years of age.

The Committee once again notes with regret that the Government’s report does not contain any information on the measures taken to align the age of completion of compulsory schooling (12 years) with the minimum age for admission to employment or work (14 years). The Committee notes that, even though article 121 of the Constitution of Nicaragua provides that primary education is free and compulsory, section 19 of the 2006 Education Act specifies that schooling is only compulsory until the sixth year of primary school (around 12 years of age). The Committee recalls that if compulsory schooling comes to an end before the age at which children are legally entitled to work, a vacuum may arise which regrettably opens the door for the economic exploitation of children (see the 2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, paragraph 371).

Considering that compulsory education is one of the most effective means of combating child labour, the Committee once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures to guarantee compulsory schooling up to the minimum age for admission to employment or work, namely 14 years. It once again requests the Government to provide information in its next report on any progress achieved in this regard.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Article 7(2) of the Convention. Effective and time-bound measures. Clause (a). Preventing the engagement of children in the worst forms of child labour. Access to free basic education. In its previous comments the Committee noted that, despite the Government’s efforts to improve the school attendance rate, the percentage of children had increased in secondary school, but remained low. The Committee requested the Government to continue taking the necessary measures to improve the school attendance and completion rates, while giving particular emphasis to inequalities in access to education related to gender and regional disparities. It also requested the Government to provide information on the results achieved, disaggregated by age and gender.

The Committee takes due note of the statistical information provided in the Government’s report which indicates that there was an increase in school attendance in 2017. The Committee also notes that, in the context of the measures adopted by the Government to improve school attendance and completion rates, while giving special emphasis to inequalities, the “Love” programme resulted in the integration in school of 19,665 girls, boys and young persons in 2017, and the promotion of 18,000 students to higher levels.

The Committee notes the Government’s indication that girls, boys and young persons in a difficult situation or a situation of inequality are provided with support by educational centres through an early warning system, which facilitates the support and care provided to them. Similarly, the centres offer a prevention service for situations of vulnerability, such as early pregnancy for young girls, gender and other types of discrimination.

The Committee notes the awareness-raising activities described in the Government’s report, including: (i) the launching of a day for the “Promotion of values”, which benefitted from the participation of 6,677 education centres and 777,047 stakeholders from the education community; (ii) the training of 14,618 school security brigades with the participation of 147,520 students, parents and teachers; and (iii) weekly meetings on “Growing up with values”, which benefitted 823,786 students and 34,648 teachers in 7,976 education centres in the country. It also notes an activity which, according to the Government, had a major impact on the education community, namely the “questions letterbox and messages board”. This activity allowed the early detection of certain situations of difficulty among students. The Committee further notes that the Government reinforce the promotion of values and the prevention of situations of risk among children through the creation of an educational game application “Valopis” which, according to the Government, reinforced the solidarity among students through play. While taking due note of the measures taken by the Government to improve the operation of the education system, the Committee encourages it to pursue its efforts to facilitate the access to education of all children, and particularly girls. It also requests the Government to provide information on the results achieved, disaggregated by age, gender and region.

Clause(b). Direct assistance for the removal of children from the worst forms of child labour and for their rehabilitation and social integration. Hazardous labour in agriculture. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to provide information on the specific results achieved under the various programmes aimed at removing children and young persons from hazardous types of work in agriculture and on the measures taken to ensure their rehabilitation and social integration.

The Committee notes the information provided by the Government on the action it has taken for the prevention of child labour in various economic sectors including: 5,998 agreements concluded between employers and the Government and special visits to 1,801 workplaces with a view to providing information to 2,815 young persons on abuses at the workplace. Nevertheless the Committee notes that the Government has not provided information on the specific measures taken in the agricultural sector. While taking due note of the measures taken by the Government, the Committee encourages it to continue its efforts and requests it once again to provide information on specific results achieved through programmes to remove children and young persons from hazardous work in the agricultural sector and on the measures taken to ensure their rehabilitation and social integration.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government

Niger

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 1978)

The Committee notes the observations of the Confederation of Labour of the Niger (CNT), received on 4 April 2018. Article 2(1) of the Convention. Scope of application, labour inspection and application of the Convention in practice. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the Government’s indication that child labour exists primarily in the informal economy and that the scope of the new Labour Code does not cover own account work or work in the informal economy. The Committee also noted the Government’s indication that labour inspectors encounter difficulties in detecting child labour in the informal economy due to its complexity and the inadequacy of their means of action. In this respect, the Ministry of Labour took measures to strengthen the capacities of the labour inspectorate, such as providing all labour inspection departments with a vehicle, recruiting new labour inspectors, increasing the budget of labour inspectors and creating new labour inspection services. The Committee noted that, according to the 2012 national survey on employment and the informal sector (ENESI) of the National Statistical Institute (INS), 50.4 per cent of children between 5 and 17 years of age (or around 1,922,637 children) were engaged in work in Niger, of whom 1,187,840 children were involved in hazardous types of work. The survey also showed that 40 per cent of jobs were in the informal economy.

Lastly, the Committee observed that, according to the analysis undertaken jointly by the Government and UNICEF in 2013 of the situation of women and children in Niger, based on an equity and human rights approach, in general, nearly half (48 per cent) of children between 5 and 14 years of age were engaged in work. Moreover, one out of two children between 5 and 11 years of age (50 per cent) and 77 per cent of children between 12 and 14 years of age were engaged in agricultural work and other activities in domestic work.

The Committee notes the observations of the CNT, according to which the Government should adopt a programme to remove children from hazardous types of work in the agricultural sector.

It notes the Government’s indication, in its report submitted under the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81), that it is envisaging the creation of labour inspection services in new communities. It observes that, in its concluding observations of June 2018, the Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights expressed concern at the fact that the labour inspection system lacks financial and human resources and does not cover the informal sector, which accounts for 70 per cent of jobs (E/C.12/NER/CO/1, paragraph 40). According to the study published in 2014 entitled “The twin challenges of child labour and educational marginalization in the ECOWAS region” by Understanding Children Work (UCW), joint ILO, World Bank and UNICEF cooperation project, 90.2 per cent of children between 5 and 14 years of age who work in the agricultural sector perform unpaid family work, and 6.2 per cent work on their own account. The Committee therefore observes that only 2.7 per cent of children between 5 and 14 years of age who work in the agricultural sector are protected by the Labour Code. The study shows that children between 5 and 14 years of age account for 24 per cent of the total workforce in the agricultural sector. In the animal production sector, children account for 41 per cent of workers. Moreover, the Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights states in its concluding observations of 2018 that a large number of children are economically exploited in the agricultural sector, slaughterhouses and domestic service, often in hazardous conditions (E/C.12/NER/CO/1, paragraph 46). The Committee once again expresses its deep concern at the number of children who have not reached the minimum age for admission to employment or work of 14 years who are compelled to work, often in hazardous conditions. The Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures to eliminate work by children under 14 years of age, particularly in the informal economy, and in hazardous conditions. It also urges the Government to take the necessary measures to extend the scope of application of the Labour Code to the informal economy and to children working on their own account. It requests the Article 3(3). Authorization to employ children in hazardous work as from the age of 16 years. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that, for certain types of hazardous work, Decree No. 67-126/MFP/T of 7 September 1967 authorizes the employment of children over 16 years of age. It also noted that occupational health and safety committees had been established in enterprises and that they were responsible for training and awareness raising on safety. The Committee noted the statement by the Government representative to the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards, indicating that it is rare for child workers to be identified because occupational safety and health committees are only established in enterprises with over 50 employees. However, the Government indicated that a national coordination unit had been established, which had conducted a number of training activities for members of occupational safety and health committees. The Conference Committee strongly encouraged the Government to ensure that occupational health and safety committees carry out awareness-raising activities and training to ascertain that the conditions of work of young persons do not jeopardize their health and safety or their well-being.

The Committee notes the observations of the CNT, indicating that the Government has not set up occupational safety and health committees in enterprises to guarantee the health and safety of young persons between 16 and 18 years of age. The Committee notes the Government’s indication that, under section 145 of the Labour Code, labour inspectors may request the creation of an occupational safety and health committee in an establishment with less than 50 employees if such a measure is deemed necessary, for example, due to activity-specific hazards, the extent of the risks observed, the nature of the work, and the layout and equipment of the facilities. The Committee observes that section 374 of Decree No. 2017-682/PRN/MET/PS of 10 August 2017 on the regulatory component of the Labour Code provides that, in enterprises or establishments with less than 50 employees, workers must elect a titular delegate and a substitute delegate for occupational safety and health. The Committee urges the Government to provide information on the measures taken to ensure that the occupational safety and health committees and occupational safety and health delegates in enterprises ensure that the working conditions of young persons between 16 and 18 years of age do not jeopardize their health and safety, in accordance with Article 3(3) of the Convention. It requests the Government to provide information on the establishment of occupational safety and health committees and occupational safety and health delegates.

The Committee notes the observations of the Confederation of Labour of Niger (CNT), received on 4 April 2018. Articles 3(a) and 6 of the Convention. All forms of slavery and practices similar to slavery and programmes of action to eliminate the worst forms of child labour. Sale and trafficking of children. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that, according to the Government, the phenomenon of trafficking was a problem in Niger and that, according to the information obtained by the high-level fact-finding mission conducted in 2006, Niger is certainly a transit country, a country of origin and a country of destination for human trafficking, including the trafficking of children. The Committee noted the adoption of Ordinance No. 2010-086 of 16 December 2010 on combating trafficking in persons in Niger, which prohibits all forms of sale and trafficking and establishes prison sentences of from ten to 30 years in cases where the victim is a child. The Committee noted that the National Commission to Coordinate Action against Trafficking in Persons (CNLTP) and the National Agency to Combat Trafficking in Persons (ANLTP) had been established to design and implement national programmes, strategies and plans to combat trafficking in persons. A National Plan of Action to Combat Trafficking in Persons had been adopted by Decree No. 488/PRN/MJ of 22 July 2014, the implementation of which was to be ensured by the ANLTP between 2014 and 2019. The Committee also noted that the ANLTP had organized training and awareness-raising sessions to combat trafficking in persons. It noted with concern the low number of prosecutions and sanctions for persons engaging in the trafficking of children under 18 years of age.

The Committee notes that, according to the information provided by the ANLTP under the Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29), the capacities of labour inspectors will be strengthened so that they are able to better detect cases of trafficking through the exploitation of forced or compulsory labour, and the fourth national day of mobilization against trafficking will focus on the trafficking of children for purposes of prostitution, begging and forced labour. The ANLTP also indicates that training and awareness-raising activities have been developed for law enforcement officials and actors involved in protection, assistance and care for victims of trafficking. The Minister of Justice indicated at a round table on the Plan of Action to Combat Trafficking in Persons and the Smuggling of Migrants that the Plan would be based on six strategic areas, including: (i) strengthening measures to prevent trafficking; (ii) care for victims; and (iii) strengthening cooperation.

The Committee observes that the United Nations Deputy High Commissioner for Human Rights is concerned about the continued existence of trafficking in children (A/HRC/WG.6/24/NER/2, paragraph 27). The Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW/C/NER/CO/3-4, paragraph 24) and the Committee on the Protection of the Rights of All Migrant Workers and Members of Their Families (CMW/C/NER/CO/R.1, paragraph 52) are also concerned about the persistence of trafficking in persons in Niger, including for purposes of sexual exploitation and forced labour. The Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women also expresses concern over the Government to continue its efforts to strengthen labour inspection capacities and training so as to enhance direct interventions in the informal economy, and to provide information on the measures adopted and the results achieved in this respect.

The Committee observes that the United Nations Deputy High Commissioner for Human Rights is concerned about the continued existence of trafficking in children (A/HRC/WG.6/24/NER/2, paragraph 27). The Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW/C/NER/CO/3-4, paragraph 24) and the Committee on the Protection of the Rights of All Migrant Workers and Members of Their Families (CMW/C/NER/CO/R.1, paragraph 52) are also concerned about the persistence of trafficking in persons in Niger, including for purposes of sexual exploitation and forced labour. The Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women also expresses concern over the low prosecution and conviction rates in cases of trafficking in women and girls. The Committee notes the data of the Statistics Directorate of the Ministry of Justice provided by the Government, and once again notes the low number of persons prosecuted. The Government indicates, in its second periodic report to the Human Rights Committee of 23 March 2018, that Niger is a country of origin, transit and destination for human trafficking. It emphasizes that trafficking in women and children is becoming increasingly widespread in Niger and includes national and transnational trafficking for purposes of exploitation in domestic services and commercial sexual exploitation (CCPR/C/NER/2, paragraph 98). In its report to the Committee on the Rights of the Child of July 2018 on the Optional Protocol to the Convention on the Rights of the Child on the sale of children, child prostitution and child pornography, the Government indicates that, according to the judicial statistics for 2015, the number of victims of trafficking for purposes, inter alia, of sale, prostitution, forced labour or pornography is 687, 48.5 per cent of whom are minor girls. According to the International Organisation for Migration (IOM), out of the 107 victims of trafficking that it assisted in Niger between January and September 2017, of whom 60 per cent were children, more than half of them said that they had been subjected to forced begging and over 30 per cent of whom said that they had been sexually exploited. The Committee notes with deep concern the extent of trafficking, particularly of children, in the country, and the low number of persons prosecuted. The Committee urges the Government to take immediate measures to ensure the effective implementation, in practice, of Ordinance No. 2010-086 on combating trafficking in persons in Niger and to provide, in particular, statistics on the number and nature of violations reported, investigations, prosecutions, convictions and penal sanctions imposed in cases of child victims of trafficking. Moreover, the Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure the implementation of the National Plan of Action to Combat Trafficking in Persons, in particular in relation to the protection of children under 18 years of age. Lastly, the Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on the activities undertaken by the CNLTP and the ANLTP, including training activities for law enforcement officials, prosecutors and judges.

Articles 3 and 7(1). Sanctions. Clause (a). All forms of slavery or practices similar to slavery. Forced or compulsory labour. Begging. The Committee previously noted the indication of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) that children are forced to beg in West Africa, including in Niger. For economic and religious reasons, many families entrust their children as from the age of 5 or 6 years to a spiritual guide (marabout), with whom they live until the age of 15 or 16 years (talibé children). During this period, the marabout has total control over the children and teaches them religion in exchange for the performance of various tasks, including begging. The Committee noted that the ANLTP had implemented a number of strategies to combat begging, including campaigns to raise the awareness of the public, local and customary authorities and marabouts, as well as training for community media, prosecutors and officers of the judicial police. The Government indicated that it had conducted an operation that involved returning persons found begging in public areas to their villages following their identification and facilitating their social and vocational reintegration. The Committee noted with concern that, although sections 179, 181 and 182 of the Penal Code punish any person who asks minors under 18 years of age to beg or who knowingly profits from such begging, the Government did not refer to any convictions of marabouts exploiting children for purely economic purposes.

The Committee notes the CNT’s indication that the Government is not managing to enforce sections 179, 181 and 182 of the Penal Code on begging. The Committee notes the Government’s indication, in its report, that a National Forum on Begging took place in December 2015 with a view to combating the phenomenon. The Government adds that several training sessions on the rights of the child have been held to strengthen the capacity of defence and security forces. The Committee nevertheless once again notes with concern that the statistics provided by the Government still do not show any conviction of marabouts who have used children for purely economic purposes. The Committee recalls that, under Article 7(1) of the Convention, the Government must take all necessary measures to ensure the effective implementation and enforcement of the provisions giving effect to the Convention including the application of penal sanctions. The Committee therefore once again urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that thorough investigations and robust prosecutions are carried out and that sufficiently effective and dissuasive sanctions are imposed upon marabouts who use children under 18 years of age for purely economic purposes. In this regard, the Committee requests the Government to continue to take the necessary measures to strengthen the capacities of law enforcement bodies. The Committee also requests the Government to continue to take effective and time-bound measures to prevent children under 18 years of age from becoming victims of forced or compulsory labour, such as begging, and to identify talibé children who are compelled to engage in begging, remove them from such situations and ensure their rehabilitation and social integration. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the progress achieved in this respect.

Clause (d) and Article 4(1). Hazardous work and the determination of hazardous types of work. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the existence of child labour, including children engaged in hazardous types of work, particularly in mines and quarries, at informal sites, where young children accompanied their parents and were involved in the production chain, in gypsum mines and in salt quarries, sometimes performing small tasks to assist their parents’ work on site or, in some cases, performing physically dangerous tasks, for more than eight hours a day, every day of the week, running the risk of accident or disease. The Committee noted that section 152 of Decree No. 67-126/MFP/T of 7 September 1967 prohibited the employment of children in underground work in mines and that the Minister of the Interior had prohibited the employment of children in mines and quarries in the areas concerned, namely Tillaberi, Tahoua and Agadzé, by means of a circular. It nevertheless noted that no convictions in this area had been secured. The Government indicated that the new regulatory component of the Labour Code was under discussion and would take into account the issue of reviewing and amending the list of hazardous types of work. The Committee requested the Government to adopt the revised list of hazardous types of work, by extending the protection of the Convention to children working in mines in the informal sector.

The Committee notes with satisfaction that Decree No. 2017-682-PRN/MET/PS on the regulatory component of the Labour Code, adopted on 18 August 2017, contains a revised list of dangerous types of work prohibited for children under 18 years of age, including a prohibition on employing children under 18 years of age in gold panning and other artisanal mining. The Committee observes that, in its concluding observations of 4 June 2018, the Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights expresses concerns on the number of children who are economically exploited in mines, often in hazardous conditions (E/C.12/NER/CO/1, paragraph 46). The Committee urges the Government to take immediate measures to ensure the effective implementation of the national legislation protecting children against underground work in mines and against work in gold panning and other artisanal mining, and to provide information on the progress achieved in this regard.

Article 6 of the Convention. Programmes of action. Plan of action to combat the sexual exploitation of children. The Committee previously noted that a National Plan of Action to Combat the Sexual Exploitation of Children was due to be adopted by the Government. The Committee once again notes the absence of information from the Government in this regard, even though the Plan was drawn up in 2007. It notes the Government’s indication that several associations conduct activities to combat the sexual exploitation of children for commercial purposes in Niamey and in the regions of Tillaberi and Dosso. The Committee urges the Government to step up its efforts to combat the sexual exploitation of children and to expedite the adoption of the National Plan of Action to Combat the Sexual Exploitation of Children, as a matter of urgency. It requests the Government to provide a copy of this Plan when it has been adopted.

Article 7(2). Effective and time-bound measures. Clause (d). Identifying and reaching out to children at special risk. 1. Street children. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that the Committee on the Rights of the Child had expressed concern at the number of children begging in the streets. It noted the Government’s indications that a Framework Document on Child Protection (DCPE) had been adopted in 2013, and that Judicial and Preventive Education Services (SEJUPs) had been established to place street children with host families further to an ordinance issued by a judge. The Committee nevertheless noted that, according to the Special Rapporteur on contemporary forms of slavery, SEJUPs appear to be scarce and unsuitable for street children, who number more than 11,000.

The Committee notes that, according to the Government, the “Protection of street children” project, developed by SEJUPs in partnership with UNICEF and the NGO Save the Children, has led to the placement of 200 street children between December 2011 and February 2013. As of 31 October 2015, 236 children had been removed from the streets, some of whom had received medical and psychological care and lessons in literacy. The Government also carried out actions to raise awareness of the issue of street children. It adds that SEJUPs have been replaced by Centres for the Prevention, Promotion and Protection of Persons (CEPPPs), particularly women and children, but that their effective implementation is compromised by the lack of human resources. The Government indicates in its report submitted under the Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138), that the CEPPPs will provide, inter alia, protection and direct assistance to persons, especially children and women, affected by violence or who find themselves in a situation of vulnerability. Moreover, the National Child Protection Programme 2014–19, developed in the framework of the DCPE, provides for the assistance, rehabilitation and reintegration of more than 250,000 vulnerable children, including street children. The Committee recalls that children in street situations are particularly vulnerable to the worst forms of child labour, and requests the Government to continue its efforts to protect them from such labour and to ensure their rehabilitation and reintegation in a targeted manner. It requests the Government to provide specific information on the results achieved in this regard, particularly in the framework of the National Child Protection Programme 2014–19 and the implementation of the CEPPPs.

2. Children in domestic work. The Committee previously noted that, according to the Special Rapporteur on contemporary forms of slavery, 58.2 per cent of economically active children are child domestic workers, 65.5 per cent of whom are between 5 and 11 years of age. These children, who are primarily girls who leave the country in order to escape poverty, are frequently subjected to physical, verbal and sexual violence, as well as discrimination; are paid very little, if anything; work long hours; may find themselves physically and socially isolated; and are not entitled to either weekly rest or holidays.

The Committee notes that, in its report attached to the Government’s report under the Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29), the ANLTP indicates that awareness-raising activities, including on the domestic work performed by children, have been organized. The Committee observes that the statistics provided by the Government do not refer to any child victims of domestic servitude. Considering that child domestic workers are particularly exposed to the worst forms of child labour, the Committee once again requests the Government to take effective and time-bound measures to protect children engaged in domestic work from the worst forms of child labour, to provide the necessary direct assistance for their removal from child labour and to ensure their rehabilitation and social integration. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the results achieved in this regard.

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 2002)

Article 1 of the Convention. National policy and application of the Convention in practice. The Committee previously noted the adoption of a National Policy on Child Labour, 2013, followed by a National Action Plan for the Elimination of Child Labour 2013–17 (NAP) which aimed at reducing the prevalence of child labour by 2015 and its total elimination by 2020. It also noted from a report entitled “The twin challenges of child labour and educational marginalization in the ECOWAS region” by Understanding Children’s Work, a joint ILO–UNICEF–World Bank interagency research cooperation project, that among the ECOWAS countries, Nigeria has the largest number of 5–14 year olds in child labour, with 10.5 million children involved in child labour. The Committee further noted the information that it had developed a National Reporting Template on child labour which would serve as a monitoring and evaluation mechanism thereby harmonizing the activities of each stakeholder.

The Committee notes the Government’s information in its report that the Federal Ministry of Labour and Employment carried out a capacity-building workshop to validate the National Reporting Template by the National Steering Committee in the six geopolitical zones of the country for the purpose of generating relevant and reliable data on the elimination of child labour. Moreover, this template has been forwarded to all the 36 states of the Federation, the Federal Capital Territory (FCT) of Abuja and to the various stakeholders at the state and local government levels and the responses are being collated. The Government also indicates that it has organized a workshop on capacity building for State controllers of Labour, Labour Desk Officers in the 36 states and the FCT as well as other stakeholders in the National Steering Committee on Child Labour. Furthermore, the Government indicates that the country commemorates the World Day Against Child Labour annually to sensitize the public and create awareness on child labour and the need for its elimination. The Committee further notes the data provided by the Government on the application in practice of child labour provisions. Accordingly, 606 violations of child labour were detected and in three cases, prosecutions were made and sanctions were applied. However, the Committee notes that according to the report based on the Multiple Indicator Cluster Survey (MICS) 2016–17 conducted by the National Bureau of Statistics with the support from UNICEF and the United Nations Population Fund (UNFPA), 50.8 per cent of children aged between 5 and 17 are involved in child labour in Nigeria, of which 39.1 per cent are working in hazardous conditions. While noting the steps taken by the Government, the Committee expresses its deep concern at the large number of children engaged in child labour in Nigeria. The Committee therefore urges the Government to intensify its efforts to ensure the elimination of child labour as laid down in the National Policy on child labour. It requests the Government to provide information on the concrete measures taken in this regard and the results achieved. The Committee also requests the Government to provide detailed information on the responses and data collected with regard to the employment of children and young persons through the National Reporting Template. Lastly, the Committee requests that the Government continue to provide information on the manner in which the Convention is applied in practice, including updated statistical data on the employment of children and young persons, especially regarding children working in the informal economy, as well as extracts from the reports of inspection services and information on the number and nature of violations detected and penalties applied. To the extent possible, this information should be disaggregated by age and gender.

Article 2(1). Scope of application. Self-employment and work in the informal economy. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that section 2 of the Labour Standards Bill of 2008 (Labour Standards Bill), read in conjunction with the definition of an “employee” as laid down under section 60 of the Bill, does not apply to children working outside a formal labour relationship, such as children working on their own account or in the informal economy. In this regard, the Committee noted from the document on the National Policy on Child Labour, 2013, that child labour is more prevalent in the informal sector, which includes crafts and artisanal work and street-related activities, as well as in semi-formal sectors which includes activities in commercial agricultural plantations, domestic and hospitality services, the transport industry, and garment manufacturing. It also noted the Government’s information that the Labour Standards Bill had been withdrawn from the National Assembly and was being reviewed by the Tripartite Technical Committee (TTC) thereby making the necessary amendments in this regard.

The Committee notes the Government’s information that section 60 of the reviewed Labour Standards Bill has addressed this issue by broadening the definition of an employee to include, “other forms of employment both in the formal and informal economy” thereby ensuring protection for all working children, including self-employed children and children working in the informal economy. The Committee expresses the firm hope that the Labour Standards Bill will ensure the protection of all working children, including self-employed children and children working in the informal economy, as required by the Convention.

Minimum age for admission to work. The Committee previously noted with concern the various minimum ages, some of them too low, prescribed by the national legislation. It noted that section 8(1) of the Labour Standards Bill prohibits the employment of a child (defined as persons under the age of 15 years (section 60)), in any capacity, except where he/she is employed by a member of his/her family on light work of an agricultural, horticultural or domestic character. The Committee observed that section 8(1) which establishes a minimum age of 15 years for employment or work as specified at the time of ratification is in conformity with Article 2(1) of the Convention. Noting the Government’s information that the revised Labour Standards Bill is awaiting the final validation by the social partners and other stakeholders, the Committee expresses its firm hope that this Bill, will establish a minimum age of 15 years for employment or work.

Article 3(2). Determination of hazardous work. The Committee previously noted that a list of types of hazardous work prohibited to young persons under 18 years of age had been identified and validated by the National Steering Committee. It also noted from the minutes of the Stakeholders Committee on the Review of the National Labour Bills of 4 May 2017, that section 60 of the Labour Standards Bill will have the list of hazardous work drafted by the National Steering Committee.

The Committee notes the Government’s information that the list of types of hazardous child labour has been finalized and incorporated into the revised Labour Standards Bill as second schedule Part A. The Committee expresses the firm hope that the Government will take the necessary measures, without delay, to ensure that the list of types of hazardous child labour is adopted and implemented, thereby prohibiting hazardous types of work to children under 18 years of age. It requests that the Government provide information on the progress made in this regard.

Article 6. Apprenticeship. The Committee previously noted that section 49(1) of the Labour Act permitted a person aged 12–16 years to undertake an apprenticeship for a maximum period of five years, while section 52(a) and (e) empowered the Minister to issue regulations on the terms and conditions of apprenticeship. It observed that sections 46 and 47 of the Labour Standards Bill of 2008 lay down the terms and conditions for entering into a contract of apprenticeship, but do not specify a minimum age. The Committee noted the Government’s information that the Stakeholders Committee on the Review of the National Labour Bills had agreed to establish the minimum age of 14 years for apprenticeship programmes, and therefore amend section 46 of the Labour Standards Bill accordingly.

The Committee notes the Government’s statement that section 46(1A) of the revised Labour Standards Bill has established a minimum age of 14 years for apprenticeship programmes. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on any progress made with regard to the adoption of the revised Labour Standards Bill which establishes a minimum age of 14 years for apprenticeship programmes, as laid down under Article 6 of the Convention.

Article 7(1) and (3). Minimum age for admission to light work and determination of light work activities. The Committee previously observed that the Labour Act did not provide for a minimum age for admission to light work. It also noted that section 8 of the Labour Standards Bill, while allowing the employment of children under the age of 15 years in light work of an agricultural, horticultural or domestic character, did not indicate the lower minimum age at which such work may be permitted. It further observed that the conditions in which light work activities may be undertaken and the number of hours during which such work may be permitted were not clearly defined in the Labour Act. Moreover, it observed that the maximum working hours of eight hours per day prescribed under section 59(8) of the Labour Act would necessarily prejudice the attendance of young persons below the age of 15 years at school or vocational orientation or training programmes, as laid down under Article 7(1)(b) of the Convention. The Committee noted the Government’s indication that the Stakeholders Committee on the Review of the National Labour Bills had agreed to address these issues.

The Committee notes the Government’s information that section 8(1A) of the revised Labour Standards Bill has established a minimum age of 13 years for admission to light work. It also notes the Government’s information that section 8(1) of the revised Labour Standards Bill contains provisions providing for the conditions and hours of work permitted to children of 13 years of age in light work activities. It further states that the list of activities that constitute light work are provided in schedule two of the revised Labour Standards Bill. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the revised Labour Standards Bill which establishes a minimum age of 13 years for admission to light work, regulates the hours and conditions of work for light work and provides for a list of light work activities permitted to children from 13 years of age, will be adopted in the near future. It requests that the Government provide information on any progress made in this regard.

Articles 3(a) and 7(2)(b) of the Convention. All forms of slavery and practices similar to slavery and effective and time-bound measures. Compulsory recruitment of children for armed conflict and providing the necessary and appropriate direct assistance for the removal of children from the worst forms of child labour, and for their rehabilitation and social integration. In its previous comments, the Committee noted from the Report of the Secretary-General on Children and Armed Conflict of 5 June 2015 (A/69/926-S/2015/409) that an increased number of children, both boys and girls, were recruited and used by Boko Haram in support roles and in combat. Children were reported to be used as human shields and as suicide bombers, particularly girls as young as 13 years. There were reports of children joining the Civilian Joint Task Force (CJTF) and other vigilante groups, voluntarily or forcibly, and used to man checkpoints, gather intelligence and participate in armed patrols. More than 500 young women and girls were reported to be abducted from their homes and schools and were subjected to forced labour, physical and psychological abuse and forced marriages to fighters of Boko Haram. This report also indicated that a large number of children were killed and maimed during Boko Haram raids in villages, targeted public places and schools.

The Committee notes the Government’s information, in its report, that it has adopted measures to monitor the engagement of underaged children in vigilante groups by introducing a mandatory registration of the vigilante and armed groups through the Ministry of Defence, the police force and the Nigeria Security and Civil Defence Corps. It also notes the Government’s information that following negotiations with Boko Haram, 104 girls out of the 110 girls who were abducted from Dapchi’s school and 104 Chibok schoolgirls out of the 276 girls who were abducted in 2014 were released. The Government report indicates that negotiations are ongoing through the mediating parties for the release of other girls.

The Committee notes from the Report of the Secretary-General on Children and Armed Conflict of 16 May 2018 (A/72/865-S/2018/465) (Report of the Secretary-General) that an action plan was signed between the CJTF and the United Nations to end and prevent the recruitment and use of children and a standing order was issued by the CJTF in this regard. According to the Report of the Secretary-General, the total number of verified cases of recruitment and use of children for armed conflict has decreased by almost 50 per cent, from 2,122 in 2016 to 1,092, including 738 boys and 353 girls, in 2017. However, the Report of the Secretary-General indicates that grave violations and abuses committed by Boko Haram against children remains gravely disturbing, in particular the use of children as carriers of person-borne improvised explosive devices as well as the large number of abductions. The Committee notes from the Report of the Secretary General that the United Nations verified the killing of 570 children, maiming of 311 children, and 45 incidents of rape and other forms of sexual violence affecting 131 children. Almost half of all casualties resulted from suicide attacks perpetrated by Boko Haram. The Committee further notes that 189 children, including 107 boys and 79 girls, were abducted by Boko Haram between July and October 2017, and an additional 1,456 children in north-east Nigeria were verified as being abducted during previous years. Moreover, more than 100 girls were reported to have been abducted in Dapchi, Yobe State, in 2018.

While noting certain measures taken by the Government on the use of children in armed conflict, the Committee must once again deeply deplore the persistence of this practice, especially as it entails other violations of the rights of the child, such as abductions, murders and sexual violence. While acknowledging the complexity of the situation on the ground and the presence of armed groups in the north-east of the country, the Committee strongly urges the Government to take measures, using all available means, to ensure the full and immediate demobilization of all children and to put a stop, in practice, to the forced recruitment or use of children under 18 years of age into armed groups. It also urges the Government to take immediate and effective measures to ensure that thorough investigations and prosecutions of all persons, who forcibly recruit children under 18 years of age for use in armed conflict, are carried out and that sufficiently effective and dissuasive penalties are imposed in practice. It requests the Government to take effective and time-bound measures to provide for their rehabilitation and social integration and to provide information on the measures taken in this regard and on the results achieved.

Article 7(2)(a). Preventing the engagement of children in the worst forms of child labour. Access to free basic education. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the various social protection policies and activities implemented in Nigeria with support from UNICEF for improving access to education, such as the School Feeding Programme, bursary and scholarship grants to indigenous families having children of school age, and the conditional cash transfer programme. It also noted from the Nigeria: Education for All Review Report 2000–14 (EFA Review Report), that there was an increase in the enrolment rates at the primary and secondary levels. However, the Committee noted with concern the estimates from the UNESCO EFA Global Monitoring Report of 2013, that there were approximately 10.5 million children who were out of school in Nigeria.

The Committee notes from the Government’s report that it has developed a National Policy on Inclusive Education, 2017, which is currently being implemented in Nigeria. It also notes that a Presidential Committee on the North-East has been set up and the Safe School Initiative was launched in 2014, through which over 2,531 students who were affected by the Boko Haram insurgency were transferred to safe schools and colleges. Moreover, the Government indicates that: (i) an enrolment campaign was launched in 2015 and is still ongoing to encourage out-of-school pupils to return to school; (ii) the Students Tutoring, Mentoring and Counselling Programme targeted at parents and students was developed in each of the three senatorial districts of 36 states and the Federal Capital Territory (FCT); and (iii) a Mother’s Association for skill empowerment was established in 13 states and the FCT in order to reduce the number of school drop-outs. The Committee further notes the Government’s reference to the statistical information from the Nigeria Digest of Education Statistics and Nigeria Education Indicator, 2016, which indicates an increase in the enrolment rates in primary schools by 0.58 per cent from 2015 to 2016, as well as an increase in the number of primary and junior secondary schools. However, the statistical data indicates a decrease by 1.28 per cent in enrolment rates in junior secondary schools, which the Government attributes to the insurgency in the north-east. The Committee finally notes the Government’s statement that the ongoing Government efforts, such as: reviewing the goals of EFA; increasing Universal Basic Education Programmes; tackling the Boko Haram insurgency; and the rehabilitation of the internally displaced children will lead to a positive trend in the educational system of Nigeria. The Committee, however, notes with deep concern from the 2018 UNICEF report on education in Nigeria, that although primary school enrolment has increased in recent years, the net attendance is still low at about 70 per cent. Nigeria still has 10.5 million out-of-school children, which is the highest in the world, with 60 per cent of them in northern Nigeria, where the conflict has deprived many children of access to education. While noting the measures taken by the Government, the Committee urges the Government to intensify its efforts to improve the functioning of the education system and to facilitate access for all children to free basic education, in particular children in north-eastern Nigeria. In this regard, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures, to increase the school enrolment and attendance rates at the primary and secondary levels and to decrease the school drop-out rates. It requests the Government to continue to provide information on the concrete measures taken in this regard and to provide updated statistical information on the results obtained, particularly with regard to reducing the number of out-of-school children at the primary and secondary levels.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Papua New Guinea

The Committee notes with concern that the Government’s report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments initially made in 2013.

Article 1 of the Convention. National plan of action and application of the Convention in practice. The Committee previously noted the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) that child labour occurred in rural areas, usually in subsistence agriculture, and in urban areas in street vending, tourism and entertainment. It pointed out that Papua New Guinea was one of the 11 countries that participated in the 2008–12 ILO-IPEC Time-bound Programme entitled “Tackling child labour through education” (TACKLE project) which aimed at contributing to the fight against child labour.

The Committee notes from the Government’s report under the Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182), that within the framework of the TACKLE project, a rapid assessment was carried out in Port Moresby targeting children working on the streets and those involved in commercial sexual exploitation. The Committee notes the Government’s statement that the findings, which were rapid and focused on Port Moresby and the other 10 provinces, indicate that similar child labour situation is occurring in other regions of the country. The rapid assessment findings indicate that children as young as 5 and 6 years of age are working on the streets and about 68 per cent of them worked under hazardous conditions. About 47 per cent of the street children between 12 and 14 years of age have never been to school and a further 34 per cent had dropped out of school. The Committee expresses its deep concern at the situation of children under 16 years of age who are compelled to work in Papua New Guinea. The Committee therefore, urges the Government to strengthen its efforts to improve the situation of children working under the age of 16 years and to ensure the effective elimination of child labour. Noting that there is no concrete or reliable data reflecting the real situation of children in the rest of the country, the Committee urges the Government to undertake a national child labour survey to ensure that sufficient up-to-date data on the situation of working children in Papua New Guinea is available.

Article 2(1). Minimum age for admission to employment. The Committee had previously noted that, although the Government of Papua New Guinea had declared 16 years to be the minimum age for admission to employment or work, section 103(4) of the Employment Act permits a child of 14 or 15 years to be employed during school hours if the employer is satisfied that the child is no longer attending school. It also noted that, by virtue of sections 6 and 7 of the Minimum Age (Sea) Act, 1972, the minimum age to perform work on board ships is 15 years and 14 years, respectively.

The Committee notes the Government’s information that the Australian Assistance for International Development through its Facilities and Advisory Services in close consultation with the ILO-IPEC and the Department of Labour and Industrial Relations has undertaken a review of the Employment Act and that the amendment process is ongoing. It also notes the Government’s indication that this process will also address the issue related to the minimum age stipulated under the Minimum Age (Sea) Act, 1972. Noting that the Government has been referring to the review of the Employment Act and the Minimum Age (Sea) Act for a number of years, the Committee once again urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the proposed amendments are adopted in the near future. In this regard, it expresses the hope that the amended provisions will be in conformity with Article 2(1) of the Convention.

Article 2(3). Age of completion of compulsory education. The Committee previously noted that education is neither universal nor compulsory in Papua New Guinea, and that the law does not specify a legal age for entering school or an age at which children are permitted to leave school. It noted that the Education Department has developed a ten-year National Education Plan for 2005–15 (NEP) to enable more children to be in school. However, the Committee observed that the NEP seemed intended to make only three years of basic education compulsory up to the age of 9. Moreover, the Committee noted that according to the ITUC, the gross primary enrolment rate was 55.2 per cent, and only 68 per cent of these children remain at school up to the age of 10, while only less than 20 per cent of the country’s children attend school.

The Committee notes from the Government’s report under Convention No. 182 that the NEP is being supported by donor agencies to implement programmes focusing on formal education and non-formal education (NFE), including assistance from the Asian Development Bank and the European Union in order to extend the NFE to the needy and the disadvantaged. The Committee notes, however, that according to the findings of the rapid assessment conducted in Port Moresby during 2010–11, although educational reforms are in place, 92.2 per cent of those children who enrolled in grade 3 would drop out along the way. The Committee expresses its deep concern at the significant number of children under the minimum age of admission to work who are not attending school. In this regard, the Committee must emphasize the desirability of linking the age of completion of compulsory schooling with the minimum age for admission to work, as provided under Paragraph 4 of the Minimum Age (Sea) Act. The Committee therefore urges the Government to take the necessary measures, particularly within the framework of the NEP, to provide for compulsory education for boys and girls up to the minimum age for admission to employment of 16 years. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the progress made in this regard.

Article 3(1) and (2). Minimum age for admission to, and determination of, hazardous work. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that while certain provisions of the national legislation prohibit hazardous work for children under the age of 16 years, there exist no provisions protecting children between the ages of 16–18 years from hazardous work. The Committee also noted the absence of any list of types of hazardous work prohibited to children under the age of 18 years.

The Committee notes from the Government’s report that the ongoing legislative review of the Employment Act will ensure the compliance of the provisions of the Convention related to hazardous work. The Committee expresses the firm hope that the amendments to the Employment Act, which will include a prohibition on hazardous work for children under the age of 18 years, will be brought before Parliament for enactment in the near future.
years as well as a determination of types of hazardous work prohibited to such children, will be adopted in the near future. It requests the Government to provide information on any progress made in this regard.

Article 3(3). Admission to types of hazardous work from the age of 16 years. The Committee previously noted that the conditions of work for young people would be examined through the ongoing Employment Act review and that the legislation relating to occupational safety and health shall also be reviewed in a way to ensure that hazardous work does not affect the health and safety of young workers. The Committee once again expresses the strong hope that the review of the Employment Act and of the legislation pertaining to occupational safety and health will be completed as soon as possible. It also hopes that the amendments made to the legislation will include provisions requiring that young persons between 16 and 18 years of age who are authorized to perform hazardous types of work receive adequate specific instruction or vocational training in the relevant branch of activity. It requests the Government to provide information on the progress made in this regard in its next report.

Article 9(3). Registers of employment. The Committee previously noted that the Employment Act does not contain any provision that requires the employers to keep registers of persons under the age of 18. It noted that section 5 of the Minimum Age (Sea) Act provides for registers to be kept by people having command or charge of a vessel, which contains particulars such as the full name, date of birth, and the terms and conditions of service of each person under 16 years of age employed on board the vessel. The Committee requested the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that, in conformity with Article 9(3) of the Convention, employers are obliged to keep registers that shall contain the names and ages or dates of birth, duly certified wherever possible, of persons whom they employ or who work for them and who are less than 18 years of age.

The Committee once again notes the Government’s information that this issue will be addressed within the review of the Employment Act. The Committee expresses the firm hope that the Government will take the necessary measures, without delay, to ensure that employers are obliged to keep register of all persons below the age of 18 years who work for them and to provide information with regard to the progress made in ensuring that the Employment Act and the Minimum Age (Sea) Act are consistent with Article 9(3) of the Convention.

The Committee urges the Government to strengthen its efforts to ensure that, during its review of the Employment Act and the Minimum Age (Sea) Act, due consideration is given to the Committee’s detailed comments on the discrepancies between national legislation and the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on any progress made in the review of these Acts in its next report and invites the Government to consider seeking technical assistance from the ILO.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee expects that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 2000)

The Committee notes with concern that the Government’s report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments initially made in 2013.

Article 3 of the Convention. Worst forms of child labour. Clause (a). Sale and trafficking of children. The Committee previously noted that women and children were trafficked within the country for the purpose of commercial sexual exploitation and domestic servitude. It requested the Government to take the necessary measures, as a matter of urgency, to adopt legislation prohibiting the sale and trafficking of both boys and girls under 18, for the purposes of labour and sexual exploitation.

The Committee notes the Government’s indication that it is addressing this issue through the adoption of the People Smuggling and Trafficking in Persons Bill which would amend the Criminal Code to include a provision prohibiting human trafficking, including children under the age of 18 years, for labour and sexual exploitation. However, the Committee notes that according to a survey conducted in 2012 within the framework of the Combating Trafficking in Human Beings in Papua New Guinea project implemented by the International Organization for Migration (IOM), trafficking for the purpose of forced labour, sexual exploitation and domestic servitude, including child trafficking, is occurring at a high rate in the country. Female children were indicated as over twice as vulnerable to becoming victims of trafficking than male children. The Committee further notes that the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW), in its concluding observations of 30 July 2010, expressed concern that there are no specific laws addressing trafficking-related problems and about cross-country trafficking, which involves commercial sex as well as exploitative labour. It requested the Committee, therefore, urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure the adoption of the People Smuggling and Trafficking in Persons Bill, without delay, and to ensure that thorough investigations and robust prosecutions of persons who commit the offence of trafficking of children are carried out and that sufficiently effective and dissuasive penalties are imposed in practice. The Committee requests the Government to supply a copy of the People Smuggling and Trafficking in Persons Bill, once it has been adopted.

Article 7(2). Effective and time-bound measures. Clause (e). Taking into account the special situation of girls. 1. Child victims of prostitution. The Committee previously noted the Government’s indication that the number of girls (some as young as 13) who engaged in prostitution as a means of survival was a growing problem in both urban and rural areas. Moreover, the Committee also noted that the laws prohibiting prostitution were selectively or rarely enforced, even in cases involving children.

The Committee notes the absence of information in the Government’s report on the measures taken or envisaged to combat the commercial sexual exploitation of children. The Committee notes that, according to the findings of the rapid assessment conducted in Port Moresby during 2010–11, there are an increasing number of girls involved in commercial sexual exploitation. The most common age at which girls engaged in prostitution is 15 years (34 per cent), while 41 per cent of the children are sex workers before the age of 15 years. The survey report further indicated that girls as young as 10 years are also involved in sex work. The Committee once again expresses its deep concern at the prevalence of the commercial sexual exploitation of children in Papua New Guinea. The Committee therefore urges the Government to take effective and time-bound measures to provide the necessary and appropriate direct assistance to remove children, particularly girls under 18 years of age from prostitution, and provide for their rehabilitation and social integration.

2. “Adopted” children. The Committee previously noted the observation of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) that indebted families sometimes pay off their dues by sending children – usually girls – to their lenders for domestic servitude. The ITUC indicated that “adopted” children usually worked long hours, lacked freedom of mobility or medical treatment, and did not attend school. The Committee also noted the Government’s indication that the practice of “adoption” is a cultural tradition in Papua New Guinea. The Committee observed that these “adopted” girls often fall prey to exploitation, as it was difficult to monitor their working conditions, and it requested the Government to provide information on the measures taken to protect these children.

In this regard, the Committee noted the Government’s reference to the Lukautim Pikinini Act of 2009 which provided for the protection of children with special needs. According to the Lukautim Pikinini Act, a person who has a child with special needs in his/her care but who is unable to provide the services required for the upbringing of a child may enter into a special needs agreement with the Family Support Service. Under these agreements, financial assistance may be provided. Pursuant to section 41 of the Lukautim Pikinini Act, the definition of a “child with special needs” includes children who have been orphaned, displaced or traumatized as a result of natural disasters, conflicts or separation, or children who are vulnerable to violence, abuse or exploitation.

The Committee notes that the Government has not provided any additional information on this issue. The Committee expresses its concern at the situation of “adopted” children under 18 years of age who are compelled to work under conditions similar to bonded labour or under hazardous conditions. It once again requests the Government to take immediate and effective measures to ensure, in law and in practice, that “adopted” children under 18 years of age may not be exploited under conditions equivalent to bonded labour or under hazardous conditions, taking account of the special situation of girls. The Committee also requests the Government to provide information on the number of “adopted” children engaged in exploitative and hazardous work who have benefited from special needs agreements.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee expects that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Saint Vincent and the Grenadines

The Committee notes with concern that the Government’s report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments initially made in 2013.

Articles 3(d) and 4(1). Hazardous work. The Committee previously noted that the Employment of Women, Young Persons and Children Act (EWYPC Act), did not contain a general prohibition on the employment of children below 18 years of age in hazardous work, other than the prohibition on night work in any industrial undertaking (section 3(2)) nor a determination of hazardous types of work prohibited to children under 18 years of age.

The Committee notes the Government’s indication that consultation with stakeholders to address the issues related to hazardous work by children will be commenced shortly and a draft report will be prepared by the end of 2013. The Committee expresses the firm hope that consultations with the stakeholders including the social partners will be held in the near future and legislation relating to the prohibition on hazardous work by children under 18 years of age as well as a regulation determining the types of hazardous work prohibited to children under the age of 18 years will be adopted soon. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on any developments made in this regard.

Article 7(1). Penalties. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the application in practice of the sanctions established in the Trafficking Act of 2011 for the offences related to the sale and trafficking of children and for the use, procuring and offering of children for prostitution and child pornography.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Samoa

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 2008)

Follow-up to the conclusions of the Committee on the Application of Standards (International Labour Conference, 107th Session, May–June 2018)

The Committee notes the discussion which took place at the 107th Session of the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards in June 2018, concerning the application by Samoa of the Convention.

Article 3 of the Convention. Worst forms of child labour. Clause (b). Use, procuring or offering of a child for the production of pornography or for pornographic performances. The Committee previously noted that section 82 of the Crimes Act 2013, makes it an offence to sell, deliver, exhibit, print, publish, create, produce or distribute any indecent material that depicts a child engaged in sexually explicit conduct. It observed, however, that for the purposes of this section a child is defined as a person under the age of 16 years. The Committee therefore urged the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the use, procuring or offering of children between the ages of 16 and 18 for the production of indecent materials is also effectively prohibited.

The Committee notes the Government’s information in its report that the Ministry of Commerce, Industry and Labour (MCIL), with the technical assistance from the Samoa Technical Facility Project is carrying out a revision of the national legislation, including the Crimes Act in order to align the definition of a child with the provisions of the Convention. The Committee expresses the firm hope that the Government will take the necessary measures, during the revision of the national legislation, to ensure that the definition of a child under section 82 of the Crimes Act will refer to persons under the age of 18 years, so that the prohibition under this section on the production and distribution of indecent materials depicting children will include children between 16 and 18 years of age. It requests the Government to provide information on any progress made in this regard.
Article 4(1). Determination of hazardous types of work. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the Government’s statement that a draft list determining the types of hazardous work prohibited to children would be submitted to the Samoa National Tripartite Forum for endorsement. The Committee expressed the firm hope that the list of types of hazardous work prohibited for children under 18 years of age would be finalized and adopted in the near future.

The Committee notes that at the Conference Committee, the Employer members expressed their concern over the absence of a list of hazardous work in which the employment of young persons is prohibited.

The Committee notes with interest the Government’s indication that the Hazardous Work List, which contains a list of types of hazardous work prohibited to children under 18 years, has been approved by the Cabinet in May 2018 and is in the process of being incorporated into the Labour and Employment Relations Regulations. The Committee notes the Government’s information that this list was reviewed by the National Occupational Safety and Health Task Force and supported by the Samoa National Tripartite Forum. The Government further indicates that the MCIL has included this list in its first National Occupational Safety and Health Framework 2018 to ensure that all stakeholders take ownership in monitoring and reporting of any activities that are in breach of this list. The Committee expresses the firm hope that the Government will take the necessary measures to ensure that the Hazardous Work List will be enacted and enforced, without delay. It requests the Government to provide information on any progress made in this regard. The Committee also requests the Government to provide information on any cases of hazardous work by children under 18 years that have been identified and reported through the National Occupational Safety and Health Framework.

Article 7(2). Effective and time-bound measures. Clause (d). Reaching out to children at special risk. Children working as street vendors. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that section 20 of the Education Act 2009 specifically prohibits the engagement of compulsory school-aged children in street trading during school hours, and that it provides for the appointment of school attendance officers, responsible for identifying children who are out of school during school hours, and returning them to school. It also noted that the Community Sector Plan of 2016–21 (CSP) provides for a platform for the development of an intervention plan to respond to the needs of vulnerable children and their families. The Committee further noted that the majority of cases regarding child vendors in the streets were mainly dealt with by the Community Engagement Unit in collaboration with the Ministry of Education, Sports and Culture (MESC) and the Ministry of Women, Community and Social Development (MWCSD), whereby parents of the children involved in street vending were held responsible, after investigation, and then charged. However, the Committee noted that, according to the ILO Rapid Assessment Report on Children working on the streets in Apia, 2017, the majority of the 106 children interviewed started working on the streets due to the fact that the family needed income (page 36). Children, as young as 7 years of age, sold food, homemade juice and razor blades in dangerous environments, and worked long hours (over five to 12 hours a day), under harsh weather conditions, to sell their products. The majority of the children work for their own family and are not aware of the social support services available to them. Noting with concern that children continued to work as street vendors, often in hazardous conditions, the Committee requested the Government to take the necessary measures to identify and protect children engaged in street vending from the worst forms of child labour.

The Committee notes that at the Conference Committee, the Employer members expressed their concern about the prevalence of under 15-year olds exploited as street vendors. Moreover, the Worker members indicated that around 38 percent of child labour in Samoa was performed by under 15-year olds, which called into question the Government’s capacity and commitment to address the worst forms of child labour.

In this regard, the Committee notes the following measures taken by the Government as indicated in its report: (i) a Child Vending Task Force (CVTF), comprised of representatives from the MESC, Ministry of Police (MoP), the MCIL and the Office of the Attorney General and the Council of Churches, was established within the MWCSD to address the issues pertaining to children working as street vendors; (ii) collaborative efforts were initiated by the MWCSD along with the MoP to monitor exploitation of children in the formal and informal economy, including through regular inspections in the streets of Apia and rural areas; (iii) awareness-raising programmes on the use of children in street vending were conducted by the Ministry of Commerce, Industry and Labour for employers in Upolu and Savaii, in order to prevent them from employing children under the age of 18 to sell goods and products during school hours; (iv) the Supporting Children initiative was started by the MWCSD in March 2016 for children from vulnerable families, in order to ensure their safety through positive parenting support and providing training and financial assistance to parents for income generating projects; and (v) the Small Business Youth Incubator for Economic Development which aims to instigate programmes for small businesses and income generating projects for youth, women and vulnerable families, were initiated. The Committee notes, however, that the Committee on the Rights of the Child, in its concluding observations of 12 July 2016, expressed its concern that children continue to work as vendors and that school absenteeism remains a challenge (CRC/C/WSM/CO/2-4, paragraph 52). While noting the measures taken by the Government, the Committee strongly encourages it to continue its efforts to identify and protect children engaged in street trading from the worst forms of child labour. It requests the Government to continue to provide information on the measures taken in this regard as well as information on the number of child street vendors who have been removed from the worst forms of child labour, including by the CVTF and through the collaborative efforts by the MWCSD and the MoP, and provided with assistance and socially integrated.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.
Viet Nam

Article 9(1) of the Convention. Penalties, labour inspectorate and application of the Convention in practice. The Committee previously noted the Government’s information that Decree No. 91/2011/ND-CP of 17 October 2011 provides for new penalties of fines for various cases of child labour, aimed at deterring the use of child labour in the country, including employing children in massage rooms, in casinos, bars, pubs or places that risk adversely affecting the development of the child, and employing children in certain illicit activities, such as the transport of illegal commodities. The Committee also noted the Government’s information regarding the statistics on the employment of children and young persons, extracted from the reports of the labour inspection services for 2006–10. According to these statistics, in total 1,715 underage workers were detected during this period. The Government indicated that the number of children subjected to heavy labour and in hazardous and dangerous conditions, while decreasing, was as high as 68,000 in 2005 and 25,000 in 2010. The Committee further noted that according to the joint ILO, UNICEF and World Bank report on Understanding Children’s Work (UCW) in Viet Nam of April 2009, an estimated 1.3 million children between the ages of 6 and 17 years were involved in child labour.

The Committee notes the Government’s information that, in 2013, two decrees were issued to strengthen the sanctioning of administrative violations of child labour and juvenile labour, including cases of child labour abuse and using child for certain illicit activities. Moreover, section 296 of the Penal Code of 2015 provides for criminal liability for violations of the law on the employment of workers under 16 years of age, with sanctions of fines, community service and imprisonment of up to 10 years.

The Committee also notes the Government’s information that, in 2012–14, with the support of the ILO, the Ministry of Labour, Invalids and Social Affairs (MOLISA) developed and distributed 1,000 sets of training materials on child labour, and organized two training courses on these materials in the provinces of Ninh Binh and Dong Nai. The labour inspectorate also undertook measures to mainstream child labour in their professional trainings. The Government indicates that, in 2015, the labour inspectorate carried out inspections on compliance with regulations on minor workers in 117 enterprises, involving 88,469 workers. No children under 15 years were found employed. Eighty-six minor workers aged 16–18 were found working mainly in the producing and tracing of apparels and seafood processing, 11 of which had not been documented for health examinations. No other violations regarding child labour were found.

However, the Committee notes that, according to the report of Vietnam National Child Labour Survey of 2012, around 1.75 million working children were categorized as “child labourers”, accounting for 9.6 per cent of the national child population (5–17 years). Among children involved in child labour, 67 per cent worked in agriculture, 16.7 per cent worked in services and 15.7 worked in industry and construction. A significant number of working children operated in open-air workplaces that demanded great mobility and exposed children to activities with high accident risks, extreme temperatures and toxic environments which could inflict injuries and damage children’s physical development. The Committee further notes that the Government is in the process of preparing the second National Survey on Child Labour.

The Committee takes due note of the Government’s information regarding the measures taken, both in law and in practice, to combat child labour. However, it notes with concern that a significant number of children are engaged in child labour in Viet Nam, including in hazardous work and this number appears to be increasing. Moreover, the Committee observes that the results of the labour inspection activities do not reflect the magnitude of child labour in Viet Nam, as indicated in the report of Viet Nam National Child Labour Survey of 2012. The Committee therefore urges the Government to intensify its efforts to ensure the effective elimination of child labour. It also urges the Government to take the necessary measures to strengthen the capacity and expand the reach of the labour inspectorate in its action to prevent and combat child labour, in particular in the informal economy and to provide information on the measures taken in this regard. Lastly, the Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on the manner in which the Convention is applied in practice, including statistics provided by the National Child Labour Survey on the employment of children under 15 years of age, extracts from the reports of the inspection services and court decisions, as well as information on the number and nature of the violations reported and the sanctions imposed.

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 2000)

Articles 3(b) and 7(2)(b) of the Convention. Use, procuring or offering of a child for prostitution, for the production of pornography or for pornographic performances; effective and time-bound measures to provide assistance for the removal of children in the worst forms of child labour and for their rehabilitation and social integration. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the adoption of the Programme of Action to Combat Prostitution (PACP) for the period 2011–15. The Committee also noted that the Committee on the Rights of the Child (CRC) expressed its concern about the increasing number of children involved in commercial sexual activity, mainly due to poverty-related reasons. The CRC further expressed its concern that children who were sexually exploited were likely to be treated as criminals by the police, and that there was a lack of specific child-friendly reporting procedures. The Committee therefore urged the Government to intensify its efforts within the framework of the PACP to combat child prostitution, and to take effective and time-bound measures to remove children under 18 years of age from prostitution and provide them with the appropriate assistance.

The Committee notes the Government’s information in its report on the implementation of the PACP 2011–15, including the adoption of several decrees and circulars regarding the protection of victims of trafficking, as well as on the measures taken to strengthen the work of child protection and care services. However, the Committee notes that no concrete information on specific measures targeting child prostitution is provided in the Government’s report. The Committee also notes that, pursuant to section 147 of the 2015 Criminal Code, only persuading, enticing and forcing a person under 16 years of age to participate in a pornographic performance constitutes an offence, which is punishable by imprisonment of up to 12 years. The Committee observes that the provisions of the 2015 Criminal Code do not appear to prohibit the use, procuring or offering of a child aged 16–18 for the production of pornography or for pornographic performances. The Committee expresses serious concern that an estimated 11 per cent of all child labourers are aged between 5 and 11 years, while 28 per cent are aged between 12 and 14 years (CRC/C/YEM/CO/4, paragraph 79). The Committee further notes from the information from an ILO survey of 2013, more than 1.3 million children between the ages of 5 and 17 were involved in child labour. It further notes that the CRC in its concluding observations of February 2014, expressed serious concern that an estimated 11 per cent of all child labourers are aged between 5 and 11 years, while 28 per cent are aged between 12 and 14 years (CRC/C/YEM/CO/4, paragraph 79). The Committee further notes from the Yemeni Humanitarian Situation Report of March 2017 that more than 9.6 million children are affected by armed conflict in the country and the number of children displaced inside Yemen has reached over 1.6 million. While acknowledging the complexity of the situation prevailing in the country, the Committee must express its deep concern at the large number of children working below the minimum age for admission to employment or work. While acknowledging the complexity of the situation prevailing on the ground and the presence of armed conflict in the country, the Committee urges the Government to take immediate and effective measures to improve the situation of children in Yemen and to protect and prevent them from child labour, including through the adoption of the national action plan to combat child labour. It requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken in this regard and the results achieved. The Committee further requests the Government to provide information on the targeted measures undertaken to combat the commercial sexual exploitation of children under 18 years of age, as well as on the results achieved. The Committee further requests the Government to provide concrete information on the effective and time-bound measures taken to remove children from commercial sexual exploitation and to provide them with the appropriate assistance for their social integration through education, vocational training or jobs.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Yemen

Article 1 of the Convention. National policy designed to ensure the effective abolition of child labour and practical application of the Convention. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the information provided by the Government in its fourth periodic report to the Committee on the Rights of the Child (2012 report to the CRC), that the Government had been focusing on projects related to education, health, social affairs and youth with an emphasis on vital projects for children, including the National Poverty Reduction Strategy (2003–15) and the National Strategy for Children and Youth (2006–15) (CRC/C/YEM/4, paragraph 23). It also noted the Government’s information in its 2012 report to the CRC that it was in the process of drafting a national action plan to combat child labour in cooperation with the ILO and the Centre for Lebanese Studies.

The Committee notes the Government’s reference, in its report, to the continuing conflict and worsening economic and social situation of the country which is affecting children’s education and future. It also notes the information that the Government, in cooperation with the ILO, employers, workers and civil society organizations have adopted a number of policies, measures and national plans to combat child labour. The Government report indicates that awareness-raising programmes on the risks of employing children under the minimum age are being implemented targeting employers, civil society organizations and local authorities; posters and banners against child labour are put up in public places; and inspections are carried out to places where children are employed, in particular in the informal sector. The Committee notes that according to the information from an ILO survey of 2013, more than 1.3 million children between the ages of 5 and 17 were involved in child labour. It further notes that the CRC, in its concluding observations of February 2014, expressed serious concern that an estimated 11 per cent of all child labourers are aged between 5 and 11 years, while 28 per cent are aged between 12 and 14 years (CRC/C/YEM/CO/4, paragraph 79). The Committee further notes from the Yemeni Humanitarian Situation Report of March 2017 that more than 9.6 million children are affected by armed conflict in the country and the number of children displaced inside Yemen has reached over 1.6 million. While acknowledging the difficult situation prevailing in the country, the Committee must express its deep concern at the large number of children working below the minimum age for admission to employment or work.
noted from the UNESCO statistics of 2011, that the net enrolment rate (NER) in primary education was 76 per cent while the NER at the secondary-school level was 40 per cent.

The Committee notes the Government’s information that it is seeking to expand and improve the quality of primary and secondary education and reach out to poorer demographic groups of the society. In this regard, the Committee notes the information that the Government, in cooperation with UNICEF, is implementing a four-year Global Partnership for Education programme covering 13 governorates, which have low rates of school enrolment, lack of infrastructure and high levels of poverty. It further notes the Government’s statement that general education faces challenges and difficulties that are preventing any progress in this field, such as population dispersal, high rate of population growth and inadequate financial resources. The Committee notes from the report of the Global Partnership for Education in Yemen (GPE), 2017, that despite the ongoing conflict, many activities were implemented across the various GPE-supported programmes which contributed to the achievement of tangible results, including: (i) the rehabilitation of 89 schools; (ii) 83,565 students being provided psychological support; (iii) 420 targeted schools in 13 governorates having received development funds for the academic years 2015–16 and 2016–17; and (iv) 8,059 teachers being trained on active learning methods. The Committee notes, however, from the UNICEF report entitled Falling through Cracks: The Children of Yemen of March 2017 that the conflict in Yemen has destroyed and damaged more than 1,600 schools raising the already high number of out-of-school children, before conflict, to more than 2 million. While noting the measures taken by the Government, the Committee express its deep concern at the large number of children who are deprived of education because of the climate of insecurity prevailing in the country. Considering that compulsory education is one of the most effective means of combating child labour, the Committee urges the Government to intensify its efforts to increase the school enrolment and attendance rates at the primary and secondary levels and to reduce school drop-out rates. It requests that the Government provide information on the measures taken in this regard and on the results achieved.

Article 6. Minimum age for admission to apprenticeship. The Committee previously noted that the Labour Code as well as Ministerial Order No. 11 of 2013 (Ministerial Order No. 11) does not contain a minimum age for apprenticeships. It requested the Government to take the necessary measures to adopt provisions establishing the minimum age for apprenticeship in conformity with Article 6 of the Convention.

The Committee notes the Government’s information that the draft Labour Code sets a minimum age of 14 years for apprenticeship and that Ministerial Order No. 11 will be amended to set a minimum age of 14 years for apprenticeship. The Committee expresses the firm hope that the Government will take the necessary measures to ensure that the provisions under the draft Labour Code and Ministerial Order No. 11, which establish a minimum age of 14 years for apprenticeship will be adopted in the near future. It requests the Government to provide information on any progress made in this regard.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Article 3(a) of the Convention. All forms of slavery or practices similar to slavery. Compulsory recruitment of children for armed conflict. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that the Government representative of Yemen, during the discussion at the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards in June 2014, acknowledged the serious situation of children in his country due to their involvement in armed conflict. The Committee also noted the Government’s statement that it had signed an action plan in 2014 to end and prevent the recruitment of children by armed forces with the Special Representative of the United Nations Secretary-General for Children and Armed Conflict. This action plan sets out concrete steps to release all children associated with the government security forces, reintegrate them into their communities and prevent further recruitment. The Committee noted that the measures to be undertaken within this action plan included: (i) aligning domestic legislation with international norms and standards prohibiting the recruitment and use of children in armed conflict; (ii) issuing and disseminating military orders prohibiting the recruitment and use of children below the age of 18; (iii) investigating allegations of recruitment and use of children by Yemeni government forces and ensuring that responsible individuals are held accountable; and (iv) facilitating access to the United Nations to monitor progress and compliance with the action plan. The Committee noted that the Conference Committee, while noting the adoption of this action plan, expressed its serious concern at the situation of children under 18 years being recruited and forced to join government forces or the armed groups.

The Committee further noted from the Government’s report that the Chief of General Staff of the Armed Forces and the Prime Minister have reiterated their commitment to implementing the measures agreed upon in the action plan so as to end the illegal recruitment of children by the armed forces. It noted, however, that according to the report of the United Nations Secretary-General to the Security Council of May 2014, the United Nations documented the recruitment of 106 boys between 6 and 17 years of age; the killing of 36 children; and the maiming of 154 children.

The Committee notes the Government’s information, in its report, that in 2012, a Presidential Decree prohibiting the recruitment of children in the armed forces was adopted. It also notes the Government’s statement that the action plan to put an end to the recruitment and use of children by the armed forces, which was concluded in 2014, has been hindered due to the worsening of the armed conflict since 2015. The Committee notes from the UNICEF report entitled Falling through Cracks: The Children of Yemen, March 2017, that at least 1,572 boys were recruited and used in the conflict, 1,546 children were killed and 2,458 children were maimed. The Committee also notes from the Report of the Ministry of Human Rights, 2018, on the increasing number of conscripted children by the Houthi militias and their methods of mobilizing these children to fight on front lines. According to this report, the percentage of children recruited by the Houthi militia has increased tenfold since 2016. The number of child soldiers among this group has reached more than 15,000. The report further indicates that children recruited by this group are forced to use psychotropic substances and drugs, and are used in attempts to penetrate Saudi borders. They are also trained to use heavy weapons, to lay landmines and explosives and are also used as human shields. The Committee notes that the Committee on the Rights of the Child (CRC), in its concluding observations on the report submitted by the Government of Yemen under the Optional Protocol to the Convention on the Rights of the Child on the involvement of children in armed conflict, of February 2014, expressed serious concern about the presence of children within the armed forces; about the recruitment of children, including girls by the pro-Government tribal militias; and about the continuous recruitment and use of children in hostilities by the non-State armed groups (CRC/C/OPAC/YEM/CO/1, paragraphs 22, 24 and 27).

The Committee deeply deplores the use of children in armed conflict in Yemen, especially as it entails other violations of the rights of the child, such as abductions, murders and sexual violence. It recalls that, under Article 3(a) of the Convention, the forced or compulsory recruitment of children under 18 years of age for use in armed conflict is considered to be one of the worst forms of child labour and that, under Article 1 of the Convention, member States must take immediate and effective measures to secure the elimination of the worst forms of child labour as a matter of urgency. While acknowledging the complexity of the situation prevailing on the ground and the presence of armed groups and armed conflict in the country, the Committee once again strongly urges the Government to take measures, using all available means, to ensure the full and immediate demobilization of all children and to put a stop, in practice, to the forced recruitment of children under 18 years of age into armed forces and groups, including through the effective implementation of the national action plan to put an end to the recruitment and use of children in armed conflict, 2014. It once again urges the Government to take immediate and effective measures to ensure that thorough investigations and prosecutions of all persons who forcibly recruit children under 18 years of age for use in armed conflict are carried out, and that sufficiently effective and dissuasive penalties are imposed in practice. It requests the Government to provide information on the number of investigations conducted, prosecutions brought and convictions handed down against such persons.

Article 7(2). Effective and time-bound measures. Clause (a). Preventing the engagement of children in the worst forms of child labour. Access to free basic education. In its previous comments, the Committee had noted the information from the Government’s fourth periodic report to the CRC of 2012, on the policies and implementation actions taken to reduce the gender gap in school enrolment and the positive results achieved. However, the Committee noted that according to the UNESCO Institute for Statistics, the net enrolment rates was low with 76 per cent (82 per cent boys and 69 per cent girls) in primary education and 40 per cent (48 per cent boys and 31 per cent girls) in secondary education. It also noted from the UNICEF Yemen Situation report of August 2013 that according to the findings of the Out of School Children Survey conducted by UNICEF in Al Dhale governorate, 78 per cent of the 4,553 children who dropped out of school were girls.

The Committee notes that the Government’s report does not contain any information on this matter. The Committee notes that the CRC, in its concluding observations of February 2014, expressed its concern at: the significant disparities in the enrolment rates of girls to basic education among the governorates of the State party and the gender gap in school enrolment rates; the persistence of traditional attitudes and beliefs that girls should not be educated, in particular in rural areas; as well as child marriages and low number of female teachers which contribute to the high rates of girls dropping out of school (CRC/C/YEM/CO/4, paragraph 69). Considering that education is key in preventing children from being engaged in the worst forms of child labour, the Committee urges the Government to intensify its efforts to improve the functioning of the education system in the country and to facilitate access to free basic education for all children, especially girls, by increasing the school enrolment rates at the primary and secondary levels and by decreasing their drop-out rates. It requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken in this regard and on the results achieved.

Clauses (a) and (b). Preventing the engagement of children in the worst forms of child labour, removing them from such work and ensuring their rehabilitation and social integration. Children in armed conflict and hazardous work. The Committee previously noted that the Conference Committee, in its conclusions, strongly encouraged the Government to provide access to free basic education for all children, particularly children removed from armed conflict and children engaged in hazardous work, with special attention to the situation of girls. In this regard, the Conference Committee called on the ILO member States to provide assistance to the Government of Yemen and encouraged the Government to avail itself of ILO technical assistance in order to achieve tangible progress in the application of the Convention.

The Committee notes from the Report of the Ministry of Human Rights, 2018, that workshops and civil society campaigns on the rehabilitation of child soldiers are being carried out and rehabilitation centres were opened for children withdrawn from armed conflict. Hundreds of child soldiers recruited by militias have been released and provided with medical care. This report further indicates that the Government of Yemen, in cooperation with the Arab Coalition and the International Committee of the Red Cross and UNICEF, received 89 child soldiers who were recruited by the Houthi militia and deployed along the borders, out of which 39 children were rehabilitated and returned to their families. The Committee urges the Government to continue to take effective and time-bound measures to ensure that child soldiers removed from armed groups and forces as well as children removed from hazardous work receive adequate assistance for their rehabilitation and social integration including reintegration into the school system or vocational training, wherever possible and appropriate. It requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken in this regard and on the results achieved.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Zambia

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 1976)

Follow-up to the conclusions of the Committee on the Application of Standards (International Labour Conference, 106th Session, June 2017)

The Committee notes the detailed discussion which took place at the 106th Session of the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards in June 2017, concerning the application by Zambia of the Convention.

Article 2(3) of the Convention. Age of completion of compulsory schooling. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that the Education Act of 2011 neither defined the school-going age nor indicated the age of completion of compulsory schooling. It also noted that according to section 34 of the Education Act of 2011, the Minister may, by statutory instrument, make regulations to provide for the basic school-going age and age for compulsory attendance at educational institutions.

The Committee notes the Government representative’s indication to the Conference Committee that consultations were ongoing to revise the Education Act of 2011 which would define the basic school-going age and link it with the minimum age for employment in Zambia. It noted that the Conference Committee recommended the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the amended Education Act sets the age of completion of compulsory education at 15 years of age, and is effectively implemented in practice, without delay.

The Committee notes the Government’s statement in its report that the official entry age for grade 1 in Zambia is 7 years and by the time of completion of grade 7, children are 14 or 15 years old. The Government further states that education is not compulsory, but once a child is enrolled in a school, it is the duty of every parent or guardian to ensure the child’s regular attendance according to section 6(1) of the School (Compulsory Attendance) Regulations Statutory Instrument (SI) No. 118 of 1970. The Committee notes the Government’s information that there has been a significant progress in the area of education during the last decade, following the implementation of various measures taken to improve access to basic education; such as the National policy on Education, Educating Our Future, 1996 which aims to provide every child access to nine years basic education by 2015; the Basic Education Sub-sector Investment Programme (BESSIP) 1999; the Technical Education and Vocational Entrepreneurship Training Plan (TEVET), 1996; the Education Sector Plan (2002–2007); the sixth National Development Plan (2011-15); the Education For All 2015; and the Free Basic Education Policy 2002. However, the Committee notes the Government’s statement that despite 15 years of concerted action, access remains a huge challenge for children in Zambia. The Committee further notes the Government’s information that the Ministry of Education is still in the process of reviewing the Education Act which has been delayed due to some technical challenges. Considering that compulsory education is one of the most effective means of combating child labour, the Committee strongly urges the Government to take the necessary steps to ensure free and compulsory education for all children up to the minimum age of 15 years for admission to employment or work, including by legally setting 15 years as the age of completion of compulsory education during the revision of the Education Act. It also requests that the Government take the necessary measures to ensure the effective implementation of the Education Act, following its adoption.

Article 7(3) of the Convention. Determination of light work. The Committee previously noted that the SI No. 121 of 2013 defines “light work” (which is permitted to children aged between 13 and 15 years as per section 4A(2) of the Employment of Young Persons and Children (Amendment) (EYPC Act of 2004) as work which is not likely to: (a) be harmful to the health or development of a child or young person; and (b) to prejudice the attendance at school, participation on vocational orientation, or a training programme approved by the competent authority, of a child or young person. It also noted that section 2 of the SI restricts the performance of light work activities to less than three hours per day. The Committee noted, however, that the Committee on the Rights of the Child, in its concluding observations of 14 March 2016, expressed concern that children aged 13 to 15 years undertook work which is reportedly not light work and that it interfered with their education (CRC/C/ZMB/CO/2-4, para. 57). The Committee notes that the Government’s report does not contain any information on this point. The Committee therefore once again requests that the Government take the necessary measures to ensure that children of 13 to 15 years of age do not participate in work other than light work which does not interfere with their education. In this regard, the Committee requests the Government to indicate whether the light work activities have been determined pursuant to section 4A(2) of the EYPC Act of 2004 as required under Article 7(3) of the Convention.

Labour inspectorate and application of the Convention in practice. The Committee previously noted that the inspections carried out by the labour inspectors identified the existence of hazardous child labour in small-scale mining, agriculture, domestic work, and trading sectors, generally in the informal economy. It also noted the Government’s information that a number of provinces had active programmes against child labour, including the activities by the District Child Labour Committees (DCLCs) to end child labour in tobacco growing communities by focusing on education as well as the results achieved following the implementation of the Achieving Reduction of Child Labour in Support of Education (ARISE) project. The Committee further noted that according to the findings of the Child Labour Report of 2012, an estimated 1,215,301 children were in child labour, registering an increase from 825,246 children in 2005.

The Committee notes that the Conference Committee recommended the Government to: strengthen its efforts to ensure the elimination of child labour both in the formal and informal sectors of the economy, including under hazardous conditions; and strengthen the capacity of the DCLCs and the labour inspectorate, in particular, in relation to small-scale mining, agriculture, domestic work and the informal economy.

The Committee notes the Government’s information that there are twenty four registered DCLCs spread across the country which aims to monitor the implementation of child labour programmes at the district and community levels. In this regard, the Committee notes from the Government’s report that: (i) the Chipata DCLC in the Eastern province provided training to 25 members including, the police, judiciary and other law enforcement officials, representatives from the Ministry of General Education, local government and other non-governmental organizations on identification of child labour and monitoring systems, mainly in the agricultural sector, occupational safety and health and child rights; and (ii) the Shiawangandu DCLC in the Muchinga province provided sensitization and awareness raising programmes at five local schools, which recorded absenteeism of pupils up to 60 per cent. The Committee also notes the Government’s information that the ARISE programme which is currently functional in the eastern and western provinces, is supporting 41 schools in 17 communities in the Western provinces of Kaoma and Nkeyema. In this regard, the Committee notes from the ARISE Annual Review of 2017 that about 4,167 children were withdrawn from child labour and placed in schools; 8,166 community members and teachers were educated on child labour; 1,961 households were provided with improved livelihoods; and 797 Community Child Labour Committee (CCLC) members were trained in child labour monitoring, data collection and work plan formulation.

The Committee further notes the Government’s information that the Ministry of Labour and Social Security (MLSS) serves as chair of the National Steering Committee on Child Labour which monitors and develops policies on child labor. The MLSS also provides technical expertise and coordinates all activities and programmes to eliminate child labour, including the activities of the DCLCs. Moreover, the Committee notes from the Government’s report that more labour officers have been recruited to boost the inspectorate to enhance enforcement of child labour laws and new vehicles have been procured to enable the inspectors to carry out the inspections. The Government further indicates its intention to establish more DCLCs in other districts that are economically active in order to combat child labour and its worst forms. The Committee, however, notes the Government’s statement that the MLSS conducts labour inspections in registered private institutions only and does not cover informal sectors where child labour is more prevalent. Moreover, the Committee notes the Government’s information that of the 24 DCLCs, only those sponsored under the ARISE programme are currently active due to lack of financial resources. While noting the measures taken by the Government, the Committee strongly encourages the Government to continue its efforts to ensure that children under the age of 15 years are not engaged in child labour in Zambia. In this regard, the Committee requests that the Government take the necessary measures to strengthen and expand the activities of the District Child Labour Committees to all the provinces as well as to strengthen the capacities of the labour inspectorate to enable it to monitor child labour in all sectors, including the informal economy. It requests the Government to continue to provide specific information on the measures taken in this regard, as well as on the results achieved. The Committee also requests the Government to provide updated statistical data on the employment of children and young persons, together with extracts from labour inspection reports.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Equality of opportunity and treatment

General observation

Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111)

General observation on discrimination based on race, colour and national extraction

On the occasion of the 60th anniversary of the adoption of the Convention, which to date has achieved almost universal ratification, and on the eve of the 100th anniversary of the ILO, the Committee wishes to recall that no society is free from discrimination and constant efforts are needed to take action against it. The elimination of discrimination and the promotion of equality of opportunity and treatment in employment and occupation, enshrined in the Convention, are among fundamental principles. The Philadelphia Declaration of 1944 declares that “all human beings, irrespective of race, creed or sex, have the right to pursue both their material well-being and their spiritual development in conditions of freedom and dignity, of economic security and equal opportunity”. The principles of equality and non-discrimination in employment and occupation are also enshrined in the 1998 Declaration on the Fundamental Principles and Rights at Work and the 2008 Declaration on Social Justice for a Fair Globalization. The Committee emphasizes that equality in the world of work can only be fully achieved within a general context of equality. In this regard, the Committee recalls that article 1 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, 1948, states that “all human beings are born free and equal in dignity and rights”, and notes that the Declaration is celebrating its 70th anniversary this year. The Committee stresses that effective application of these principles is crucial to the realization of social justice and lasting peace by ensuring that no one is left behind.

The Committee recalls that Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention defines discrimination as any distinction, exclusion or preference made on the basis of race, colour, sex, religion, political opinion, national extraction or social origin, which has the effect of nullifying or impairing equality of opportunity and treatment in employment and occupation. The Convention also covers any other grounds as may be determined by the Member concerned after consultation with representative employers’ and workers’ organizations, where such exist, and with other appropriate bodies (Article 1(1)(b)). While recognizing that discrimination based on all grounds falling within the scope of the Convention persists around the world, the Committee has decided to devote this observation to discrimination based on race, colour and national extraction.

The Committee recalls that in its 2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, it reviewed the application of the Convention with respect to all prohibited grounds of discrimination and noted the progress being made in many countries in giving effect to its provisions. The Committee however also noted that, whereas discrimination on the grounds of race, colour and national extraction is generally prohibited in national legislation in most countries, far fewer countries have adopted proactive and comprehensive measures aimed at promoting substantive equality in respect of these grounds. This is despite long-standing international action against discrimination, including the adoption of the International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination, in 1965, complemented by the World Conference against Racism, Racial Discrimination, Xenophobia and Related Intolerance Declaration (Durban, 2001), the proclamation, in December 2014, by the United Nations General Assembly of the International Decade for People of African Descent (2015–24), and more recently the 2030 Agenda for Sustainable Development (2030 Agenda). In this regard, the Committee recalls that the 2030 Agenda recognizes that “rising inequalities within and among countries” is one of the major challenges confronting the world today. The Committee notes that inequalities disproportionately affect certain groups and members of those groups because of their race, colour or national extraction, which often intersects with other prohibited grounds of discrimination under Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention, such as social origin and religion, with compounding effects on women and girls.

The Committee recalls that under the Convention the term “race” includes any discrimination against linguistic communities or minority groups whose identity is based on religious or cultural characteristics or national or ethnic origin. In the context of the Convention, discrimination on the basis of race is generally examined together with discrimination based on colour, since “colour” is one of the ethnic characteristics that differentiate human beings. The Committee also recalls that national extraction covers distinctions made on the basis of a person’s place of birth, ancestry or foreign origin. In its examination of governments’ reports submitted under the Convention, the Committee has thus addressed discrimination in employment and occupation experienced by ethnic minorities, indigenous and tribal peoples, migrant workers, including migrant domestic workers, afro-descendants, national minorities and Roma people, among others, as an aspect of discrimination on the basis of race, colour and national extraction.

1 This is not the first time that the Committee has formulated a general observation devoted to a particular ground of the Convention. In 2002, it adopted a general observation on a particular topic under the ground of sex, namely, sexual harassment (published in 2003). In the same vein, the Committee has also adopted two general observations under the Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100): the first one in 1998 in order to provide specific guidance on the type of statistics, disaggregated by sex, which the Committee needs in order to assess the progress in the implementation of the Convention; and the second one in 2006 in order to underscore the importance and clarify the meaning of “work of equal value”.

EQUALITY OF OPPORTUNITY AND TREATMENT

The Committee has noted that given the persisting patterns of discrimination on the grounds of race, colour and national extraction, in most cases there is a need for comprehensive legislation containing explicit provisions defining and prohibiting discrimination in all aspects of employment and occupation, in order to ensure full application of the Convention. These definitions should include direct and indirect discrimination, and discrimination-based harassment as a serious form of discrimination, in particular racial harassment. Racial harassment occurs where a person is subject to physical, verbal or non-verbal conduct or other conduct based on race which undermines their dignity or which creates an intimidating, hostile or humiliating working environment for the recipient. Moreover, the intersection of factors such as race, religion, gender or disability increases the risk of harassment, particularly in respect of young women from an ethnic or racial minority.

The Committee also notes that the underlying causes of discrimination and de facto inequalities, resulting from deeply entrenched discrimination and long-standing social exclusion, cannot effectively be addressed without proactive measures. The Committee has considered that in many cases special measures of the type outlined in Article 5 of the Convention are needed to remedy the effects of past and present discriminatory practices and to promote equal opportunities for all. Noting that forms of discrimination based on race, colour and national extraction often interact with other prohibited grounds of discrimination, including for example, religion, social origin and sex, the Committee has drawn the governments’ attention to the need to take into consideration and address the effects of multiple forms of discrimination in employment and occupation. The Committee has also recalled that universal education, compulsory and free of charge to the same level for everyone, is one of the basic starting points for a national equality policy required under Articles 2 and 3 to promote equality of opportunity and treatment in employment and occupation.

The Committee has welcomed the adoption of legislation to redress past or present discrimination by an increasing number of countries. That legislation imposes a duty both to prevent and combat discrimination and to promote equality of opportunity and treatment in employment and occupation, because this form of legislation may prove to be most effective in addressing discrimination on the grounds of race, colour and national extraction. The Committee has been pleased to note the efforts deployed in many countries to tackle discrimination and promote equality of opportunity and treatment, irrespective of race, colour and national extraction, by various concrete measures including: (i) targets and quotas in education, vocational training and employment; (ii) special employment promotion programmes; (iii) action plans targeting specific ethnic groups; and (iv) the establishment of specialized bodies with varying mandates, ranging from awareness-raising and promotional functions to dealing with discrimination complaints and formulating policy recommendations.

In spite of all these efforts, the Committee notes with regret that the impact of the measures taken remains uncertain in most cases, particularly in the absence of regular monitoring and periodic evaluations. In only a few cases have specific studies been undertaken with a view to examining the situation in employment and occupation of persons belonging to specific ethnic groups and establishing a baseline from which governments, social partners and other stakeholders are able to assess the real impact of such measures periodically. This adds to the lack of collection and publication of employment statistics disaggregated by ethnic origin in many countries, due to either the lack of technical capacity or the absence of legislation and procedures that allow for such collection. The Committee emphasizes that data and qualitative research on the nature and extent of labour inequalities, including its underlying causes, are crucial to determine the nature, extent and causes of discrimination, design and implement a relevant and effective national equality policy under Articles 2 and 3 of the Convention, and monitor and evaluate its results. It recalls that Article 3(f) requires governments to report on the action taken in pursuance of the national equality policy and the results secured by such action. In this connection, the Committee has systematically requested that governments regularly assess the impact of such policies, in order to review and adjust existing measures and strategies on a continuing basis. The Committee also wishes to stress the importance of consulting with the social partners and the interested groups on the design, monitoring, implementation and evaluation of the measures and plans adopted with a view to ensuring their relevance, raising awareness about their existence, promoting their wider acceptance and ownership and enhancing their effectiveness.

The Committee notes with concern that discriminatory attitudes and stereotypes based on the race, colour or national extraction of men and women workers continue to hinder their participation in education, vocational training programmes and access to a wider range of employment opportunities, resulting in persisting occupational segregation and lower remuneration received for work of equal value. These factors also frequently drive many persons from these groups into jobs in the informal economy. The Committee also notes that employment quotas, where they exist, remain frequently unfilled, reportedly often due to the lack of skilled persons from the designated groups or because of insufficient efforts to recruit actively the persons targeted. The Committee thus considers that it is necessary to adopt a comprehensive and coordinated approach to tackling the obstacles and barriers faced by persons in employment and occupation because of their race, colour or national extraction, and to promote equality of opportunity and treatment for all. Such an approach should include the adoption of interlocking measures aimed at addressing gaps in education, training and skills, providing unbiased vocational guidance, recognizing and validating the qualifications obtained abroad, and valuing and recognizing traditional knowledge and skills that may be relevant both to accessing and advancing in employment and to engaging in an occupation. The Committee also recalls that, in order to be effective, these measures must include concrete steps, such as laws, policies, programmes, mechanisms and participatory processes, remedies designed to address prejudices and stereotypes and to promote mutual understanding and tolerance among all sections of the population.
The Committee emphasizes the importance of ensuring coordination and complementarity between the interlocking measures and strategies adopted, and between the various competent bodies with a view to ensuring coherence and enhancing impact, while avoiding duplication of efforts and promoting the optimal use of resources. The Committee also considers that it is important to mainstream the promotion of equality of opportunity and treatment in employment and occupation in relevant national policies, such as education and training policies, employment policies, poverty reduction strategies, rural or local development programmes, women’s economic empowerment programmes, and climate mitigation and adaptation strategies.

The Committee further notes that some workers face challenges in seeking to engage in the occupation of their choice because of discrimination, in law and practice, based directly or indirectly on race, colour and national extraction. For example, unsecure land tenure and biased approaches towards the traditional occupations engaged in by certain ethnic groups, which are often perceived as outdated, unproductive or environmentally harmful, continue to pose serious challenges to the enjoyment of equality of opportunity and treatment in respect of occupation for many persons. In this regard, the Committee wishes to emphasize that promoting and ensuring access to material goods and services required to carry out an occupation, such as secure access to land, and access to credit and resources, without discrimination, should be part of the objectives of a national policy on equality. Any discriminatory law and practice affecting access to and performance of an occupation, contrary to the equality policy, must be repealed in accordance with Article 3 of the Convention.

The Committee recalls the important role that employers’ and workers’ organizations play in promoting understanding, acceptance and realization of the principles of the Convention which set out broad requirements of active cooperation with employers’ and workers’ organizations with respect to the effective implementation of the national equality policy required under the Convention. The Committee also underlines the importance of collective agreements in applying the national equality policy and advancing equality of opportunity and treatment for all workers, irrespective of race, colour or national extraction.

The Committee, furthermore, notes that significant barriers remain in many countries that impede access to justice for those discriminated against on the basis of race, colour and national extraction, among other grounds, including physical, financial and linguistic obstacles. The Committee thus invites governments to establish accessible dispute resolution mechanisms, where they do not yet exist, and to ensure that the applicable burden and standard of proof do not impede access to justice for victims. In this respect, the Committee recalls that it has noted with interest that in some countries, once the complainant has produced plausible or prima facie evidence of discrimination, the burden of proof shifts to the employer. The Committee further encourages governments to explore avenues towards expanding the accessibility of existing mechanisms, including by amending the rules on legal standing to include civil society organizations, equality bodies, workers’ and employers’ organizations, and other representative institutions, and to raise public awareness of the relevant legislation and remedies available. The Committee also recalls that sanctions imposed must be effective, proportionate and dissuasive, and effective protection from retaliation must be ensured to the victims of discrimination who lodge complaints or bring cases before the competent authorities, and to witnesses. Further, the Committee considers that addressing discrimination based on race, colour and national extraction through criminal proceedings only, is normally not sufficient – due to the sensitivity of the issue, the standard of proof which is harder to meet, and the fact that criminal law does not address the full range of behaviour that constitute this type of discrimination – and invites governments to ensure that civil remedies are available.

In light of the above, the Committee encourages governments, in cooperation with workers’ and employers’ organizations and other interested bodies, to strengthen their efforts in the following areas and to provide information in future reports on the measures adopted or envisaged in this respect:

(i) assessing the situation in employment and occupation of all ethnic groups in their countries and the discrimination faced by them, through dedicated studies, surveys and disaggregated data gathering, respectful of confidentiality, through informed consent and voluntary self-identification, in order to inform the formulation and evaluation of appropriate measures, taking into account the effects of multiple forms of discrimination;

(ii) consulting, with the social partners and, wherever possible, with interested groups on the design, implementation, monitoring and evaluation of the measures and plans adopted under the national equality policy;

(iii) adopting proactive and comprehensive measures to promote the substantive equality of all persons and redress discrimination based on race, colour and national extraction including in its multiple forms;

(iv) ensuring that appropriate measures to promote equality of opportunity and treatment irrespective of race, colour and national extraction in respect of non-waged work are also included in the national equality policy which take into account the compounding effects of discrimination on women, especially as regards access to land, credit and other productive resources;

(v) regularly monitoring and assessing the results achieved within the framework of the national equality policy with a view to reviewing and adjusting existing measures and strategies and identifying any need for greater coordination between measures and strategies and between competent bodies in order to streamline interventions;

(vi) undertaking awareness-raising and educational programmes to combat prejudices and stereotypes based on race, colour and national extraction, including developing specific programmes to be used in schools;
(vii) enhancing the capacity of enforcement authorities, including labour inspectors, tribunals and other competent bodies, as well as workers’ and employers’ organizations, migration authorities, job placement entities, and other relevant actors to identify, prevent and address cases of discrimination; and

(viii) ensuring that the enforcement and remedies available in respect of discrimination based on race, colour and national extraction in employment and occupation are primarily effected through civil law rather than criminal law.

Noting that several countries still retain legal provisions that do not specifically prohibit discrimination on the grounds of race, colour or national extraction, the Committee recalls that it has consistently indicated that, where legal provisions are adopted to give effect to the principle of the Convention, they should include at least all of the grounds of discrimination specified in Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention, as well as a clear definition of discrimination, and it therefore urges the governments of those countries to take the necessary steps to amend their legislation with a view to including them.

Finally, the Committee recalls that governments can avail themselves of the technical assistance of the ILO regarding these matters.

Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100) (ratification: 1969)

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Equal remuneration for work of equal value. Legislation. The Committee previously noted that while some of the provisions of the Labour Law (namely sections 8, 9(1), 59(4) and 93) read together provided some protection against discrimination based on sex with respect to remuneration, they did not reflect fully the principle of the Convention. The Committee takes note of the Government’s indication, in its report, that the Tripartite Consultative Committee is still engaged in the revision process of the Labour Law with a view to ensuring greater conformity with the provisions of the Convention. The Committee wishes to point out that the concept of “work of equal value” lies at the heart of the fundamental right of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value as it permits a broad scope of comparison, including, but going beyond equal remuneration for “equal”, “the same” or “similar” work, and also encompasses work that is of an entirely different nature, which is nevertheless of equal value (see 2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, paragraph 673). The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on the activities and recommendations of the Tripartite Consultative Committee concerning the revision of the Labour Law, and trusts that in the near future its national legislation will explicitly give full legislative expression and effect to the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value set out in the Convention.

Gender pay gap. The Committee welcomes the statistics provided by the Government and notes that, according to the Afghanistan Living Conditions Survey (ALCS) for 2013–14, women’s average monthly wages were lower than those of men in all job categories, except in the public sector. Men were earning on average 30 per cent more than women in the same occupation and up to three and a half times more than women in the agriculture and forestry sector, where women represented two-thirds of the workforce. The Committee notes that, according to the ALCS for 2016–17, the situation of women has deteriorated as the labour force participation rate of women decreased from 29 per cent in 2014 to 26.8 per cent in 2017, and remained far lower than the labour force participation of men (80.6 per cent in 2017). Moreover, more women than men were in a vulnerable employment situation (89.9 per cent of women compared to 77.5 per cent of men). The Committee regrets that the ALCS for 2016–17 does not contain any more information on the gender pay gap. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken to reduce the gender pay gap and identify and address its underlying causes, as well as on the results achieved in this regard. Recalling the importance of the regular collection of statistics in order to undertake an assessment of the nature, extent and evolution of the gender pay gap, the Committee requests the Government to provide updated information on the earnings of men and women disaggregated by economic activity and occupation, both in the private and public sectors, as well as any available statistics or analysis on the gender pay gap.

Article 3. Objective appraisal of jobs. Civil service. Referring to its previous comments, the Committee takes note of the salary scale annexed to the Civil Servants Law, 2008, according to which salaries are determined by reference to diplomas, skills and work experience. The Committee notes from the data of the national Central Statistics Organization that in 2016 women represented 22.5 per cent of all public sector employees, but only 7.5 per cent of those were placed in the third grade or higher position. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the practical application of section 8 of the Civil Servants Law, 2008, including on the methods and factors used to classify jobs under the different grades in order to ensure that tasks mainly performed by women are not being undervalued in comparison to the tasks traditionally performed by men. The Committee further requests the Government to provide information on the distribution of men and women in the various categories and positions of the civil service with their corresponding levels of earnings.

Article 4. Awareness-raising activities. Cooperation with employers’ and workers’ organizations. The Committee notes the Government’s indication that public information campaigns and activities to raise awareness about the principle of the Convention, particularly among employers’ and workers’ organizations, have been continued, some of which with the assistance of the ILO. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on awareness-raising activities carried out to promote the principle of the Convention, and to indicate whether any cooperation or joint activities have been undertaken together with the employers’ and workers’ organizations. The Committee also requests the Government to specify whether, as a result of the awareness-raising activities already implemented, the principle of the Convention has been effectively addressed by the social partners in collective agreements and, if so, to provide information in this respect, including copies of the relevant provisions.

Enforcement. The Committee notes that, in the National Labour Policy for 2017–20, the Government recognizes laxity in the enforcement of labour-related legislation and indicates that periodic inspections will be conducted to reveal quality of compliance, as well as gaps in compliance for which appropriate actions would be taken against defaulting employers. The Committee further notes that, in its last concluding observations, the United Nations Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW) expressed concern at the fact that decisions of informal justice mechanisms are discriminatory against women and undermine the implementation of existing legislation, and recommended that women’s accessibility to the formal justice system be enhanced (CEDAW/C/AFG/CO/1-2, 30 July 2013, paragraphs 14 and 15). The Committee requests the Government to provide information as to the steps taken to ensure stricter enforcement of labour legislation as regards the application of the Convention. In particular, the Committee requests information regarding compliance with the requirements of the Convention, including the level of compliance and the identification of gaps in compliance, as well as any actions taken against defaulting employers. The Committee further requests the Government to provide information on any measures taken or envisaged to enhance women’s accessibility to the formal justice system, as well as on any complaints made with regard to the principle of the Convention dealt with by the courts or any other competent authorities, including information on sanctions and remedies provided.

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Legislation. The Committee previously noted that the prohibition of discrimination in section 9 of the Labour Law is very general and urged the Government to take the opportunity of the Labour Law reform process, in the context of the Decent Work Country Programme and the National Action Plan for Women of Afghanistan (NAPWA) 2007–17, to amend its legislation to explicitly prohibit direct and indirect discrimination covering all the grounds listed in Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention, as well as any other grounds determined in consultation with employers’ and workers’ organizations, in accordance with Article 1(1)(b) of the Convention. The Committee notes the Government’s indication, in its reports, that the Tripartite Consultative Committee is still engaged in the revision process of the Labour Law. Referring to its previous comments on section 10(2) of the Civil Servants Law, 2008, which only prohibits discrimination in recruitment based on the grounds of sex, ethnicity, religion, disability and “physical deformity”, the Committee notes the Government’s general statement that provisions of the Labour Law are also applicable to civil servants. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on the activities and recommendations of the Tripartite Consultative Committee concerning the revision of the Labour Law, and trusts that in a near future its national legislation will explicitly prohibit, both in the private and public sectors, direct and indirect discrimination covering all the grounds listed in Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention, as well as any other grounds determined in consultation with employers’ and workers’ organizations, in accordance with Article 1(1)(b) of the Convention, covering all aspects of employment and occupation. In the meantime, the Committee requests the Government to clarify the relationship between section 9 of the Labour Law and section 10(2) of the Civil Servants Law and, more generally, to indicate whether all the provisions of the Labour Law shall apply to civil servants or whether this is limited to provisions of the Labour Law which are expressly referred to by the Civil Servants Law.

Article 1(1)(a). Discrimination on the ground of sex. Work-related violence and sexual harassment. The Committee takes note of the Law on the Prohibition of Harassment against Women and Children, adopted in December 2016 and approved by the President on April 2018, which defines and criminalizes physical, verbal and non-verbal harassment, and provides that harassment is punishable with a fine. On the other hand, it notes that section 30 of the Law on the Elimination of Violence against Women (EVAW), 2009, which provides that harassment is punishable by up to six months of imprisonment, was firstly incorporated into the revised Penal Code in March 2017 and then removed on the instruction of the Government in August 2017, as a result of pressure exerted by some members of the Parliament, which left the status of the EVAW Law in a state of uncertainty. The Committee also notes that several United Nations (UN) bodies expressed concern at the escalating level of targeted attacks, including killings, against high profile women, particularly those in the public sector, as well as at the prevalence of sexual harassment against women in the workplace (Report of the UN High Commissioner for Human Rights, A/HRC/37/45, 21 February 2018, paragraph 55 and Report of the UN Special Rapporteur on violence against women, its causes and consequences, A/HRC/29/27/Add.3, 12 May 2015, paragraphs 21 and 26). It notes that, according to a survey carried out in 2015 by the Women and Children’s Legal Research Foundation, based in Afghanistan, 87 per cent of the women interviewed experienced harassment in the workplace. It further notes that the Afghanistan Independent Human Rights Commission (AIHRC) recently indicated that women police officers are particularly affected and that the Ministry of the Interior is currently finalizing an internal complaints mechanism to this end (Report of the UN High Commissioner for Human Rights, A/HRC/37/45, 21 February 2018, paragraph 53). The Committee notes that, pursuant to the 2015 Regulations on the Elimination of Harassment
Albania

The Committee notes that the Government’s report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments initially made in 2016.

Article 1 of the Convention. Prohibited grounds of discrimination. Legislative developments. The Committee notes with interest the adoption of Law No. 136/2015 which came into force in June 2016 and introduces amendments to the Labour Code. The Committee notes that section 9(2) prohibits discrimination in employment and occupation on a wide range of grounds that are already covered by section 1 of the Protection from Discrimination Law No. 10221 of 2010, and adds the grounds of disability, HIV/AIDS or union affiliation. The prohibition of discrimination covers access to employment, access to vocational training, and working conditions including termination of employment and remuneration (section 9(5)). In case of violations of section 9, the Committee notes that under new section 9(10), the burden of proof shifts to the employer once the plaintiff submits evidence upon the basis of which the court may presume discriminatory behaviour. The Committee further notes that new section 32(2) now defines and prohibits both quid pro quo and hostile environment sexual harassment. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the application in practice of section 9 of the Labour Code, including on any activities carried out in order to raise awareness of workers, employers and their organizations, as well as of labour inspectors and judges on the new provisions of the Labour Code protecting workers from discrimination in employment and occupation.
Discrimination on the basis of political opinion. The Committee recalls that for a number of years, it has been expressing concern regarding the potentially discriminatory effect of “illustration” laws (Law No. 8043 of 30 November 1995 and afterwards Law No. 10034 of 22 December 2008) which provided for the exclusion of persons who had certain duties under the previous regime from serving in a broad range of public functions. The Committee also recalls that according to an amicus curiae opinion of the Venice Commission of the Council of Europe, aspects of the new “illustration” Law No. 10034 of 2008 were found to interfere disproportionately with the right to stand for election, the right to work and the right to access to public administration. The Committee notes with interest the Government’s indication in its report that by Decision No. 9, dated 2 March 2010, the Constitutional Court of the Republic of Albania unanimously decided that the “illustration” Law No. 10034 of 2008 was unconstitutional and consequently without effect.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government. The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Legislation. The Committee refers to its previous comments, in which it asked the Government to take the opportunity provided by the revision of the General Labour Act to address the specific issues raised by the Committee since 2013 concerning, in particular, the definition and grounds of discrimination, the prohibition of sexual harassment, the restrictions on women’s access to work, and the coverage of the measures for workers with family responsibilities provided for in the Act. The Committee notes with regret that the new General Labour Act (Act No. 7/015), which was adopted on 21 April 2015, addresses none of the matters raised by the Committee. Recalling the importance of a clear and comprehensive legislative framework in order to ensure the effective implementation of the Convention, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary steps to address the matters raised by the Committee with a view to bringing the General Labour Act fully into conformity with the Convention, and to provide information on any developments in this regard.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100) (ratification: 2003)

The Committee notes that the Government’s report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments initially made in 2016.

Article 1(a) and (b) of the Convention. Work of equal value. The Committee previously noted that section E8(1) of the Labour Code of 1975, which provides that “no woman shall, merely by reason of her sex, be employed under terms or conditions of employment less favourable than that enjoyed by male workers employed in the same occupation and by the same employer”, did not give full legislative expression to the principle of the Convention. The Committee merely recalls that prohibiting sex-based wage discrimination will not normally be sufficient to give effect to the Convention, as it does not capture the concept of “work of equal value” set out in Article 1(b) of the Convention (see 2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, paragraph 676). It also recalls the importance of giving full legislative expression to the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value, particularly given the existence of occupational sex segregation, as women and men often work in different occupations (see 2012 General Survey, paragraphs 673 and 697). In this regard, the Committee takes due note of the Government’s indication that the National Labour Board has reviewed the Labour Code and that a report has been submitted to the relevant authority for necessary action. The Committee trusts that the revised text of the Labour Code will clearly set out the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value – which should not only provide for equal remuneration for men and women working in the same occupations, but also for equal remuneration for work carried out by men and women that is different in nature but nevertheless of equal value – and will ensure that the principle of the Convention can be applied even where there is no sufficient comparator group employed by the employer. It requests the Government to report on the progress made.

Remuneration. The Committee recalls its previous comments regarding the use and definitions of the terms “wages”, “gross wages”, “remuneration” and “conditions of work” referred to in sections A5, C3, C4(1) and E8(1) of the Labour Code. The Committee had noted that the definition of “gross wage” appeared to be in accordance with the definition of remuneration set out in Article 1(a) of the Convention, but that it remained unclear whether section C4(1) prohibiting sex discrimination with respect to wages covered the gross wage. While noting the Government’s indication that the terms “wages”, “gross wages”, and “remuneration” were used interchangeably in practice, the Committee noted that these various terms were often understood to have distinct meanings, thus potentially giving rise to confusion. Noting the review of the Labour Code, the Committee requests the Government to ensure that the revised text will harmonize the provisions of the Labour Code relevant to wages and remuneration, and include a clear definition of “remuneration” which covers not only the ordinary, basic or minimum wage or salary but also any additional emoluments whatsoever payable directly or indirectly, whether in cash or in kind, by the employer to the worker and arising out of the worker’s employment, in accordance with Article 1(a) of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to report on the progress made in this regard.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request directly addressed to the Government. The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.
Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111)
(ratification: 1983)

Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention. Grounds of discrimination – National extraction and social origin. For a number of years, the Committee has been noting the absence of an explicit prohibition of discrimination in the national Constitution (article 14(3)) or the Labour Code (section C4(1)) on the basis of national extraction and social origin. In its 2012 report, the Government indicated that, when the new Labour Code would be published, national extraction and social origin would be included to give full effect to the Convention. The Committee notes with regret the persistent lack of information in the Government’s latest report on the concrete steps taken to ensure and promote protection of workers against discrimination with respect to these grounds in law or in practice. The Committee recalls that even as the relevance of each of the grounds enumerated in the Convention may be different for each country, new forms of discrimination may emerge over time due to labour market and societal changes, and need to be addressed. Further, where provisions are adopted in order to give effect to the principle of the Convention, they should at least include all the grounds of discrimination laid down in Article 1(1)(a) (2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, paragraph 853). The Committee requests the Government to ensure that workers are protected in law and in practice, against direct and indirect discrimination on the basis of national extraction and social origin, in all aspects of employment and occupation, and to monitor emerging forms of discrimination that may result or lead to discrimination in employment and occupation on the basis of these grounds, and to report in detail on the progress made.

Noting the Government’s indication that the National Labour Board has reviewed the Labour Code and submitted a report to the relevant authority for the necessary action to be taken, the Committee hopes that the revised text of the Labour Code will include specific provisions defining and prohibiting direct and indirect discrimination, in all aspects of employment and occupation, and with respect to all the grounds of discrimination set out in the Convention, namely race, colour, sex, religion, political opinion, national extraction and social origin, and requests it to provide information on the progress made.

Article 2. Equality between men and women. Access to employment, vocational training and education. The Committee notes that the Government continues to provide very general information relating to its national policy to promote and ensure equality of opportunity and treatment of men and women with respect to access to employment, education and vocational training. With a view to enabling the Committee to assess in an effective way the progress made in ensuring equality of opportunity and treatment between men and women, the Committee urges the Government to take concrete steps to collect, analyse, and provide statistical information, disaggregated by sex, on the participation of men and women in education at all stages and various vocational training courses offered, as well as statistics on the number of men and women that have filled vacancies following such training, including for jobs traditionally held by the other sex. The Committee also urges the Government to provide detailed information on recent initiatives taken or envisaged to promote women’s participation in courses and jobs traditionally held by men, including up to date information on the courses offered by the Gender Affairs Department and the Ministry of Education, as well as the Institute of Continuing Education.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Argentina

Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111)
(ratification: 1968)

The Committee notes the observations of the General Confederation of Labour of the Argentine Republic (CGT RA), received on 31 August 2018, in which the CGT RA: notes the need for a national public policy covering all the grounds of discrimination set out in the Convention; refers to the working conditions of migrant workers, particularly women migrants engaged in domestic service and the textile sector; hopes to receive further information on the employment programmes implemented by the Ministry of Labour, Employment and Social Security (MTEySS) in order to monitor those programmes with a view to ensuring that there is no discrimination against, for example, the migrant population and indigenous peoples; and notes the possibility of improving the legislation in force applicable to migrant workers in an irregular situation.

The Committee also notes the observations of the Confederation of Workers of Argentina (CTA Autonomous), received on 1 September 2018, indicating that: (i) although the right to not suffer discrimination and receive equal treatment is enshrined in the national legal system, practice shows that this is not sufficient and, consequently, adequate supervisory measures and mechanisms are needed to ensure effective compliance with legislation and guarantee the right to equality of persons with disabilities, women and the most vulnerable groups, in particular with respect to access to employment and more senior posts, and equal remuneration; (ii) affirmative action measures are needed to guarantee the genuine enjoyment of rights; (iii) the austerity measures adopted by the Government have directly and indirectly affected workers with disabilities, 90 per cent of whom are unemployed, and there is a lack of vocational training and the necessary support to allow persons with disabilities to enter the labour market; and (iv) gender equality has not been achieved in enterprises and the country’s gender equity model should cover areas such as employee selection, promotion and training, vocational development, the reconciliation of work and family life, sexual harassment and the working environment.

The Committee also notes the observations of the Confederation of Workers of Argentina (CTA Workers), received on 11 September 2018.

The Committee requests the Government to provide its comments on the observations made by the trade unions.
Legislation. The Committee notes that the Government refers in its report to the draft Gender Equality Bill (INLEG-2018-10434057-APN-PT), which was submitted to Congress in March 2018. The Committee notes that this Bill is designed to amend the Employment Contracts Act and, more specifically, sections 172, 173, 175 and 176 on gender equity and equality of opportunity, providing, among others, that: (i) gender equity and equality of opportunity shall be guaranteed in all aspects of working life (section 172); and (ii) workers, regardless of gender, may opt to perform work assigned by their employer outside the workplace, and may provide services via telework or distance work (section 175). The Committee also notes that the draft Bill provides for the development of codes of conduct for employers or their adhesion to a code of conduct with a view to guaranteeing gender equality within the enterprise (section 2); provides that trade unions shall adopt statutory rules to guarantee respect for gender equality within their organizations (section 3); and provides that the parties to collective labour agreements shall adopt the relevant clauses to guarantee gender equality and the application of these agreements (section 4). The Committee welcomes this legislative initiative and requests the Government to report any developments in this respect.

Regarding the provisions on equal remuneration and the reconciliation of work and private and family life, the Committee refers to its comments on the application of the Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100), and the Workers with Family Responsibilities Convention, 1981 (No. 156).

Article 1 of the Convention. Protection against discrimination. In its previous observation, the Committee requested the Government to continue providing information on the implementation in practice of the measures taken pursuant to general Recommendation No. 6 of 2009 (promotion of equal treatment in access to employment without discrimination based on age, physical appearance, social origin, nationality and disability) of the National Institute to Combat Discrimination, Xenophobia and Racism (INADI), aimed at promoting equal treatment in access to employment. The Committee also requested the Government: (i) to provide information on the application in practice of the new section 73 of the Employment Contract Act which, following the adoption of Act No. 26.911 of 13 December 2013, prohibits the employer “at the time of recruitment, during the contract or with a view to the termination thereof, to conduct any kind of inquiry, research or investigation into the political, religious, trade union or cultural views or sexual orientation of the worker”, and on any complaints concerning the application of the Convention; and (ii) to indicate which specific measures have been adopted with a view to guaranteeing adequate protection against discrimination on all the grounds provided for in the Convention, in relation to access to employment, during the employment and upon its termination.

The Committee notes the Government’s indication that INADI plans to produce a report on discrimination in access to employment with the aim of updating general Recommendation No. 6 of 2009 and is continuing to conduct training and awareness-raising activities for members of the business, trade union and public sectors. Regarding complaints presented in relation to section 73 of the Employment Contracts Act, the Committee notes the Government’s indication that 207 and 153 complaints were received regarding cases of discrimination on the grounds of ethnicity, religion, sexual orientation and nationality, inter alia, in 2016 and 2017, respectively. The Government also reports that INADI has issued several non-binding opinions, in which it expressed its views on whether there had been discriminatory behaviour and, where necessary, made the relevant recommendations, in addition to proposing its good offices or conciliation, resolving 96 cases between 2016 and 2017. The Committee requests the Government to continue providing information on the specific measures adopted with a view to guaranteeing adequate protection against discrimination on all the grounds set out in the Convention and on the complaints received and their outcome. The Committee also requests the Government to provide information on the results of the study into discrimination in access to employment conducted by INADI and any follow-up actions taken and their outcomes.

Article 2. National equality policy. In its previous observation, the Committee requested the Government: (i) to provide information on any developments concerning the adoption of a national equality policy covering at least all the grounds of discrimination set out in the Convention in addition to other criteria established in the national legislation, such as disability; (ii) to provide information, pursuant to Article 3(f) of the Convention, on the specific measures taken to implement the principle of equality and non-discrimination in employment and occupation; (iii) to continue providing information on the action taken by INADI in response to complaints of discrimination in employment, disaggregated by grounds of discrimination, including any penalties imposed and compensation awarded; and (iv) to provide information on the implementation in practice of Ministerial Decision No. 270/2015, which prohibits HIV testing in the pre-employment examination. The Committee notes the Government’s indication that INADI is preparing a publication to raise the awareness of the population of the barriers faced by persons with HIV in accessing the world of work and is developing training programmes with networks of enterprises regarding the prohibition on conducting pre-employment HIV testing. The Committee recalls that, while the relative importance of the issues related to each of the prohibited grounds of discrimination set out in the Convention may vary from one country to another, when examining the situation and deciding the measures to be adopted, it is essential to take into account all the grounds in the application of the national policy. The Committee once again requests the Government to provide information on any developments concerning the adoption of a national equality policy covering at least all the grounds of discrimination set out in the Convention in addition to other criteria established in the national legislation, such as disability. The Committee also requests the Government to evaluate the results achieved through the application of the national equality policy and to provide information in that respect. Please also continue providing information on the implementation in practice of Ministerial Decision No. 270/2015, which prohibits HIV testing in the pre-employment examination.
Indigenous peoples. The Committee recalls that in its previous observation it referred to the signature on 19 November 2013 of a framework cooperation agreement between the MTEySS and INADI, the goal of which is to ensure and promote the right to equal opportunity and treatment in access to employment and to establish cooperation mechanisms to remove discrimination on various grounds, especially towards indigenous peoples. The Government also reports on the adoption by INADI and the Secretariat of Employment of the “Safeguarding indigenous peoples” initiative, the objective of which is to raise the awareness of officials in employment offices and vocational training institutions regarding non-discrimination towards indigenous peoples in access to employment and training. The Committee therefore requested the Government: (i) to provide information on the results achieved through these measures and to continue taking steps to increase the vocational training and guidance opportunities for indigenous peoples and to promote their access to employment and occupation on an equal footing with other workers; and (ii) to provide statistical information, disaggregated by sex, on the participation of indigenous workers in the labour market. The Committee notes the Government’s indication that INADI participated in the Inter-ministerial Roundtable for Indigenous Peoples (MIMPI), through which action lines were proposed to enhance the inclusion of indigenous men and women in state public policies. The Government also indicates that various information materials have been published on the rights of indigenous peoples in order to raise awareness and eradicate structural discrimination against them. The Committee also notes the Government’s indication of complaints related to the discrimination suffered by indigenous men and women and notes that, in 2016 and 2017, respectively two and ten complaints from indigenous persons were received. The Committee recalls that, where no cases or complaints, or very few, are being lodged, this is likely to indicate a lack of an appropriate legal framework, lack of awareness of rights, lack of confidence in or absence of practical access to procedures, or fear of reprisals (see 2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, paragraph 870).

The Committee notes that, in its concluding observations, the United Nations Committee on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination (CERD) expressed concern about the persistent structural discrimination against indigenous peoples; the difficulties faced by members of indigenous peoples in gaining access to the formal labour market and their concentration in work that does not allow them to gain access to fundamental labour rights (CERD/C/ARG/CO/21-23, 11 January 2017, paragraphs 6 and 31). The Committee notes that, in its concluding observations, the United Nations Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW) expressed concern at the fact that indigenous women face intersecting forms of discrimination in the country, based on their ethnic origin and social status, in addition to racial hatred, violence, poverty and marginalization (CEDAW/C/ARG/CO/7, 25 November 2016, paragraph 40). The Committee requests the Government to continue taking proactive measures with a view to guaranteeing equality of opportunity and treatment in employment and occupation for indigenous men and women, including measures designed to guarantee their access to the material goods and services necessary to take up an occupation on an equal footing with other sectors of the population, and to provide information on their impact on the application of the Convention and any obstacles encountered. The Committee also requests the Government to provide statistical information on the participation of indigenous workers in the labour market, disaggregated by sex. The Committee also requests the Government to provide information on any measures adopted or envisaged with a view to examining whether the existing substantive provisions and procedures allow in practice indigenous peoples and their members to lodge and proceed with complaints and on the obstacles and difficulties encountered, and requests the Government to continue providing information on the number of complaints of discrimination lodged, their nature and outcome.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Bahamas

Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100) (ratification: 2001)

In view of the short report sent by the Government, the Committee notes with concern that the questions raised previously about the determination of rates of remuneration, objective job evaluation, collective agreements and the effectiveness of the enforcement mechanisms have not been addressed since 2004. The Committee reiterates that without the necessary information, it is not in a position to assess the effective implementation of the Convention, or any progress achieved since its ratification in 2001. It firmly hopes that the next report will contain full information on the points described below.

Article 1 of the Convention. Equal remuneration for work of equal value. Legislation. The Committee recalls that, in its previous comments, it had pointed out that section 6 of the Employment Act, 2001, unduly limits the scope of “work of equal value” to work performed in the same establishment, requiring substantially the same skill, effort and responsibility, and which is performed under similar working conditions and refers to “rates of pay” which, pursuant to section 2(1), is narrower than the term “remuneration” set out in the Convention. The Committee notes that the Employment Act was amended in April 2017 by the Employment (Amendment) Act (No. 5 of 2017). However, it notes with deep concern that the Government did not seize this opportunity to amend section 6 of the Act with a view to giving full legislative expression to the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value. It also notes that, in its reply to the list of issues and questions raised by the United Nations Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW) in relation to the sixth periodic report of the Bahamas, the Government continues to refer to section 6 of the Employment Act, 2001 (CEDAW/C/BHS/Q/6/Add.1, 9 July 2018, paragraph 80), despite the fact that CEDAW has been raising this issue for more than 15 years. The Committee, once again, urges the Government to take active steps to amend section 6 of the Employment Act, 2001, in order to give full legislative expression to the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value. In this regard, the Committee asks the Government to ensure that the legislation allows for the comparison not only of jobs in the same establishment and requiring substantially the same skills, efforts and responsibility, and performed under similar working conditions, but also of work of an entirely different nature which is nevertheless of equal value, and provides for a broad definition of “remuneration” as set out in Article 1(a) of the Convention.

Article 2. Determining rates of remuneration. The Committee notes the Government’s statement according to which it is unable to provide rates of remuneration and specify how rates of remuneration are determined in the civil service and the public sector. In its 2012 General Survey, on the fundamental Conventions, paragraphs 670 and 671, the Committee indicates that member States bound by the Convention cannot be passive in their approach to implementing the Convention and that they are obliged to ensure the application of the principle of the Convention where the State is the employer or otherwise controls business or where the State is in a position to intervene in the wage-fixing process. The Government must take proactive measures in order to assess, promote and ensure the application of the principle of the Convention. The Committee trusts that the Government will be in a position to provide information in its next report on the manner in which remuneration is determined in the civil service and the public sector, including copies of wage scales and information on the method and criteria used to establish them.

Article 3. Objective evaluation of jobs. The Committee notes the Government’s indication that it has prepared a “White Paper” on legislation for the establishment of a National Productivity Council and that in a few years, it may be possible to provide reports relating to the development and use of objective job evaluation systems on the basis of the work performed in the public and the private sectors. While acknowledging that the implementation of the Convention may need to be achieved over time, the Committee recalls that, the right to equal remuneration for work of equal value being a fundamental right, the period for the full application of the Convention should be as short as possible, with deadlines being fixed for the attainment of specific objectives (2012 General Survey, paragraph 671). The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the progress made towards the adoption of legislation for the establishment of a National Productivity Council and, in the meantime, on any measures taken or agreements and policies adopted providing for objective job evaluation including the time frames proposed for their implementation.

Article 4. Cooperation with workers’ and employers’ organizations. Noting the indication from the Government that it does not have anything to report on this point, the Committee requests, once again, the Government to indicate the measures taken or envisaged to encourage the social partners to discuss the principle of equal remuneration between men and women for work of equal value and to include provisions to that effect in their agreements.

Enforcement. As the Government’s report is silent on this point, the Committee firmly hopes that the Government will take steps to improve the capacity of labour inspectors to detect and address pay inequalities between men and women for work of equal value, and to ensure that workers are informed of their right to equal pay for work of equal value and of the dispute resolution mechanisms available. The Committee requests, once again, the Government to provide information on any activities undertaken in this regard.

Practical application and statistics. In its previous comment, the Committee had requested the Government to take steps to determine the underlying reasons for wage differentials between men and women, and to indicate the measures taken or envisaged to address these differentials in various occupations, particularly in the higher-level occupational category of senior officials and managers, where the wage gap is particularly striking. It notes that the Government has not provided the information requested. According to the statistics of 2017 to which the Government refers in its report, the long-existing average weekly wage gap between men and women in the accommodation and food service activities industry for New Providence (where 70 per cent of the population lives) was eliminated in 2013 – a year where the weekly wage reached a ten-year low – but reappeared as from 2014 and has been increasing ever since. The Committee requests, once again, the Government to take steps to determine the underlying reasons for wage differentials between men and women, and to indicate the measures taken or envisaged to address these differentials in various occupations, particularly in the higher-level occupational category of senior officials and managers. The Government is also asked to continue to provide statistical information on the earnings of men and women in the various economic sectors and occupations in the public and private sectors.

Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention. Discrimination grounds. Legislation. The Committee recalls that, in its previous comment, it noted that section 6(a) of the Employment Act of 2001 had not been amended to include “colour”, “national extraction” and “social origin” as prohibited grounds of discrimination and asked the Government to identify the specific steps taken to ensure protection against discrimination on the basis of the above-mentioned grounds in practice. The Employment Act was amended in April 2017 by the Employment (Amendment) Act (No. 5 of 2017). The Committee notes with concern that the Government did not take this opportunity to amend section 6(a) of the Act. Recalling that where legal provisions are adopted to give effect to the principle of the Convention, they should include at least all the grounds of discrimination specified in Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention, the Committee asks the Government to amend the Employment Act of 2001 accordingly. In the meantime, it asks the Government to provide information on the specific steps taken to ensure protection against direct and indirect discrimination in employment and occupation, in practice, on the basis of the grounds of colour, national extraction and social origin, and to provide a copy of any judicial decision to this effect.

Articles 2 and 3. Equality of opportunity and treatment between men and women. The Committee recalls its previous comments noting the occupational segregation of men and women, including in the higher occupational category of senior officials and managers. The Government’s report is silent on this point. However, the Committee notes the information provided by the Government to the United Nations Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW), in its sixth periodic report, according to which there remains marked occupational segregation not only in terms of employment but also in education. According to data from the Department of Statistics, in 2015, women dominated sectors such as hotels and restaurants; financing, insurance, real estate and other business; and community, social and personal services; but represented 6 per cent or less of workers in construction or agriculture, hunting, forestry and fisheries. In its report to CEDAW, the Government indicated that the percentage of women who graduated in 2015 from the College of the Bahamas in the fields of sciences (11.78 per cent), law (5.79 per cent), engineering (0.20 per cent) or agriculture (0 per cent) were significantly low. Similarly, among graduates from the Bahamas Technical and Vocational Institute (BTVI), women were overwhelmingly represented in certain sectors (100 per cent in cosmetology, fashion design production, aesthetics; and 83 per cent among office assistants) and not at all in sectors leading to higher-paying occupations such as construction technology; information technology management or support; auto mechanics; electronics and cable installation; heating, ventilation and air conditioning; or plumbing (CEDAW/C/BHS/6, 26 May 2017, paragraphs 93, 94 and 101). The Committee observes that the above information confirms that, despite the increasing number of women graduating, they remain concentrated in so-called typically female occupations. The Committee reiterates its request to the Government to provide detailed information on the measures taken to address the occupational segregation of men and women and to promote women’s participation in a wider range of training courses, including those traditionally undertaken by men. The Government is also asked to indicate, including by means of statistics disaggregated by sex, the results achieved by the adoption of any measures to promote women’s access to a wider variety of jobs which have better career prospects in the public and private sectors.

The Committee notes with concern that the Government’s report contains no reply to some of its previous comments. It expects that the next report will contain full information on the matters raised in its previous comments initially made in 2010, on the following points:

Article 5. Special measures. The Committee recalls that article 26(4)(d) of the Constitution, by referring to the “special circumstances” of the persons protected from discrimination, would appear to allow for the taking of positive measures in favour of those covered by the Convention. The Committee notes the Government’s indication that it is committed to taking the necessary measures to ensure compliance with the Convention pending further review of the Employment Act, 2001, though it does not elaborate on the meaning of this constitutional provision, as requested by the Committee. The Committee therefore reiterates its request to the Government to indicate whether it has or intends to rely on article 26(4)(d) of the Constitution in order to take positive measures to promote the employment of women or certain disadvantaged groups.

Application of the Convention in practice. The Committee notes that the Government’s report still does not contain any information regarding the questions raised in Parts III and IV of the report form, but that the Government expresses its commitment to providing such information. The Committee asks the Government to collect and provide information on the concrete steps taken by the Ministry of Labour to promote and ensure equality in employment and occupation, including information on the relevant activities of labour inspection services and the public labour employment exchange services. Please also provide any relevant decisions of the Industrial Tribunal or the courts with regard to equality in employment and occupation, particularly decisions involving section 6 of the Employment Act and state the number of complaints that have been filed in recent years alleging discrimination in employment and education, and the outcome of such complaints.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Bahrain

The Committee notes the report of the direct contacts mission as well as the observations made by the General Federation of Bahrain Trade Unions (GFBTU) and the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), received respectively on 30 August and 1 September 2018.

Follow-up to the conclusions of the Committee on the Application of Standards (International Labour Conference, 107th Session, May–June 2018)

The Committee notes the discussion in the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards (CAS) of the International Labour Conference, at its 107th Session (June 2018), on the application of the Convention, and the conclusions adopted. The conclusions of the CAS called upon the Government of Bahrain: (i) to provide information on the measures taken to implement the commitments contained in the Tripartite Agreements of 2012 and 2014 signed under the auspices of the ILO, concerning the resolution of cases involving suspension, dismissal and other sanctions imposed on trade union members and leaders, following the events of 2011, and to ensure that all the outstanding cases of reinstatement and compensation for the cases falling under the scope of the Tripartite Agreements are resolved; (ii) to ensure that its legal framework is in conformity with the requirements of the Convention, in particular with regard to the definition and formal prohibition of direct and indirect discrimination across all seven grounds in the Convention, and of sexual harassment; (iii) to ensure that migrant workers as well as domestic workers are included in the protection of anti-discrimination law; and (iv) to repeal any provisions that constitute an obstacle to the recruitment and employment of women. The Committee notes that during the discussion held in June 2018, the Government accepted the CAS request (made in June 2017) that a direct contacts mission take place. This took place between 15 and 19 September 2018. Finally the Committee notes that following the visit of the direct contacts mission, the Government sent a communication to the ILO providing updated information concerning the implementation of the Tripartite Agreements of 2012 and 2014 and communicating copies of draft amendments and regulations submitted to Cabinet, in accordance with the direct contacts mission’s request.

I. Measures taken to implement the commitments contained in the Tripartite Agreements of 2012 and 2014

Article 1 of the Convention. Discrimination on the basis of political opinion. The Committee recalls that, at the 100th Session (June 2011) of the International Labour Conference, a complaint under article 26 of the ILO Constitution concerning the non-observance by Bahrain of the Convention was filed by some Workers’ delegates at the Conference.
According to the complaint, in February 2011, suspensions and various other sanctions, including dismissals, were imposed on trade union members and leaders, as a result of peaceful demonstrations demanding economic and social changes and expressing support for ongoing democratization and reform. The complaint alleged that these dismissals (approximately 4,600) were on the grounds of the workers’ opinions, beliefs and trade union affiliation. At its 319th Session (October 2013), the Governing Body welcomed a Tripartite Agreement, reached in March 2012 by the Government, the GFBTU and the Bahrain Chamber of Commerce and Industry (BCCI). At its 320th Session (March 2014), the Governing Body welcomed the adoption of a Supplementary Tripartite Agreement signed in March 2014 on the final settlement of the dismissed workers. Consequently, the complaint under article 26 of the ILO Constitution was closed and the Governing Body invited this Committee to follow up on the implementation of the Tripartite Agreements, in particular with regard to the 165 outstanding dismissal cases (according to the list annexed to the Supplementary Tripartite Agreement of 2014) and to examine the application of the Convention by the Government.

In its 2017 report submitted pursuant to article 22 of the ILO Constitution, the Government explained that all the cases concerning workers dismissed for reasons relating to the events of February 2011 had been resolved on the basis of cooporation at the national level between the social partners. However, the Committee noted that, according to ITUC observations, 64 cases of dismissal relating to the events of February 2011 were still outstanding. Noting that the GFBTU, which is a party to the Tripartite Agreements, did not send its observations confirming that there had been full implementation of the above-mentioned Agreements, the Committee had asked the Government to provide evidence that the cases of the 165 dismissed workers mentioned by name in the Annex to the Tripartite Agreement of March 2014 had been resolved to the respective satisfaction of the parties.

In its latest report the Government stresses the efforts exerted by the Tripartite Committee set up to settle the cases of workers who had been dismissed in the wake of the 2011 events. The Government indicates that, only nine cases (out of the initial 4,600) remain outstanding but that they are about to be settled. The Government provides a detailed account of the steps taken in this regard in cooperation with the GFBTU. The Committee notes that this information was also communicated to the direct contacts mission during its meeting with officials of the Ministry of Labour and Social Development (MLSD). As for the “certificate of rehabilitation”, mentioned in the Committee’s previous comment, the Government indicates that it is not a precondition for employment nor necessary to benefit from the Government’s services in training and placement but that it is a document delivered by the courts, upon request, to workers who have been convicted by the courts, served their sentence and who have expressed the wish to apply once again for a job in the public sector.

The Committee notes that in their observations both the GFBTU and the ITUC maintain that there are more than the nine outstanding cases mentioned by the Government. They argue that of the 64 cases which were still pending in 2017, at the date of submitting their observations and at the meeting with the direct contacts mission (September 2018), 55 cases remain outstanding. Both organizations draw attention to the fact that, apart from the alleged 55 outstanding cases, there remain a number of other outstanding issues regarding the implementation of the Tripartite Agreements, which relate to:
(i) the fact that, although according to the Tripartite Agreements, dismissed workers were entitled to be reinstated in sectors and with job descriptions similar to those in which they had worked prior to their dismissals, in practice this undertaking is not always respected. The GFBTU and the ITUC give concrete examples, such as the case of a company driver who was reinstated as a forklift operator, and a trade union leader formerly employed as an engineer now working in the maintenance service; (ii) cases that could not be considered as a proper implementation of the Tripartite Agreements, for example some workers have been pressured to accept early retirement or to become self-employed, while others were arbitrarily dismissed shortly after being reinstated; (iii) cases where workers have been dismissed because they were facing criminal charges (contrary to Bahraini law, where only a guilty verdict following a criminal trial could justify termination of employment) and were still waiting to be reinstated after having been found not guilty; and (iv) a lack of proper compensation for the loss of income incurred since dismissal and the treatment of social security contributions for the period between dismissal and reinstatement or the acceptance of a financial package in lieu of reinstatement (with the exception of the cases of BCCI and the University of Bahrain, where dismissed workers were fully compensated). Finally, both organizations indicate that, following the signing of the Tripartite Agreement of 2014, 17 new cases of dismissals have occurred, based on the same grounds as of 2011 (political opinion, belief and trade union affiliation).

The Committee notes that during its last meeting with the direct contacts mission, the GFBTU indicated a willingness to acknowledge that some of the 55 cases were close to being resolved. However, the GFBTU emphasized that it could only undertake a proper assessment of some of these cases once a three-month period had elapsed after reinstatement and the workers were able to confirm that they were satisfied with the arrangements made. As to the nine cases that had been mentioned by the MLSD as the only remaining cases, information regarding the most recent MLSD efforts for the settlement of five of these cases is noted. The Committee further notes that the GFBTU indicated a willingness to further discuss with the MLSD the list of 55 cases, if effective efforts were made to resolve the remaining four cases, out of the nine acknowledged by the MLSD to be outstanding, bearing in mind that these four cases were former employees of Government departments who had not been convicted of any crime. Further, the GFBTU emphasized that, for those workers whose cases had not been resolved, the consequences for them and their families were severe (no regular income since 2011 and sometimes no possibility of finding new employment as they are “blacklisted”). The GFBTU expressed the hope that the outstanding matters could be effectively settled by January 2019. From the information contained in the direct contacts mission report, the Committee notes that Bahrain’s tripartite constituents have made strenuous efforts to resolve the remaining cases listed in the Tripartite Agreements of 2012 and 2014 and that consequently very few cases remain outstanding. However, it notes that the number of outstanding cases is still the subject of dispute between the Government (nine) and the GFBTU (55) and that the direct contacts mission acknowledged that each and every case that remains outstanding is important because of the impact on the workers affected and on their families. It also notes that, both the Government and the GFBTU have expressed their commitment to coming to an agreement on the number of outstanding cases and to resolving them. Welcoming this commitment, the Committee calls upon both parties to strengthen their efforts to agree upon the number of outstanding cases and to resolve them in accordance with the Tripartite Agreements, including with regard to financial compensation and the provision of social insurance coverage for the period of interrupted service. It urges the Government and the GFBTU to address the outstanding cases in a constructive, pragmatic and flexible way without delay in order to move forward and engage with other pressing issues for the tripartite constituents. Noting that the Tripartite Agreements of 2012 and 2014 contain an undertaking from the tripartite constituents that they will “promote social and institutional dialogue through strengthening the existing tripartite mechanisms in accordance with national laws and regulations as well as with international principles and standards” in order “to strengthen productive relations and advance social dialogue”, the Committee wishes to point out that the Tripartite Agreements provide an opportunity not only to resolve the individual cases but also to develop constructive social dialogue, which has been hindered since 2011.

In its previous comments, the Committee had asked the Government to provide its comments on the allegations of Education International (EI) and the Bahrain Teachers Association (BTA) that, following the dismissal of a number of teachers involved in the peaceful demonstrations during the 2011 events, some 9,000 expatriates had been hired from Arab States by the Ministry of Education and that a two-tier teacher workforce has been established with expatriate teachers benefiting from better conditions than nationals. The Committee notes that according to the Government, this information is erroneous as the Ministry of Education (MoE) has reinstated the small number of dismissed workers. Furthermore, the Government indicates that the MoE continues to advertise its vacancies, carry out the necessary tests and interviews and employ Bahraini citizens as a priority, in conformity with the national policy of “indigenization” of the public sector in general and of educational jobs in particular (Bahrain Economic Vision 2030). Expatriate employment is limited to specializations in which national graduates are lacking and each year the Government earmarks a large amount of its budget for training its national employees to progressively replace expatriate teachers. As a result, in the past years, all the teachers benefiting from promotions and grades are Bahraini citizens; consequently, 100 per cent of the MoE upper and middle management, directors and high officials are nationals of Bahrain. On this point, the Government also draws the Committee’s attention to the fact that the BTA was dissolved in 2011 and it questions the credibility of any information provided by the Association. In addition, the Committee notes the information given to the direct contacts mission during its meeting with officials of the MoE that, out of a total of 25,000 employees (in the public sector), no more than 70 teachers were dismissed and to date all of those teachers have been reinstated with full compensation (back pay and social security coverage from the date of dismissal). There have not been reinstatements in four cases because the persons concerned had criminal records and responsibility for such cases lies with the Civil Service Bureau (CSB). During its meeting with the direct contacts mission, the CSB confirmed that the 180 teachers who had been dismissed in 2011 had all been reinstated with full benefits; the four outstanding dismissal cases were not linked to the 2011 events but related to other grounds (mainly misconduct), and referred the direct contacts mission to section 25.1(g) of the Civil Service Law (Reasons for termination service) which stipulates that: “An Employee’s service shall be terminated for the following reasons: … Dismissal from service by a disciplinary action or in accordance with a judicial ruling.” The Committee notes that, during its meeting with the GFBTU, the direct contacts mission was told that 15 teachers who were members of the BTA had been dismissed following the events of 2011, and five of them, including the Vice-President, had still not been reinstated nor had they been provided with any information on the progress of their cases and consequently were unable to gain employment in private schools due to the lack of clearance from the MoE. In addition, the direct contacts mission was informed that dismissed teachers were frequently replaced by teachers who had recently been naturalized as Bahraini citizens. The Committee therefore asks the Government to provide its comments on these allegations, including whether the difficulties encountered by the dismissed workers are linked to the failure to issue a “certificate of rehabilitation”.

With regard to discrimination based on political opinion, the Committee notes the concluding observations of the United Nations Human Rights Committee (HRC) on the initial report of Bahrain on the application of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (CCPR). In these concluding observations, while acknowledging the State Party’s need to adopt measures to combat acts of terrorism, the HRC expressed concerns that the Act on the Protection of Society from Acts of Terrorism (Act No. 58/2006) provides for an overly broad definition of terrorism that is susceptible to wider interpretation which may result in violations of the right to freedom of expression and assembly. It notes that the HRC is concerned at reports of the extensive use of the Act outside the scope of terrorism, including against human rights defenders and political activists (CCPR/C/BHR/CO/1, 26 July 2018, paragraph 28). Noting that the same concerns were mentioned by the GFBTU during its meetings with the direct contacts mission, and that the ITUC indicates in its observation that the CSB recently published a circular which anticipates disciplinary measures, including dismissal, for any worker “abusing the social media” the Committee recalls that the protection against discrimination on the basis of political opinion under the Convention implies protection in respect of the activities relating to the expression or demonstration of views in opposition to established political principles and opinions. It also covers discrimination based on political affiliation. The protection of political opinion applies to opinions which are either expressed or demonstrated, but does not apply where violent methods are used (see 2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, paragraph 805). The Committee asks the Government to ensure that the application in practice of Act No. 58/2006 does not infringe the right to be protected from discrimination on the ground of political opinion and to keep it informed of any developments in this respect. It also asks the Government to specify the nature of the offence of “social media abuse” mentioned by the ITUC to ensure that political opinion does not fall under the purview of the new circular.

II. Measures to ensure that Bahrain’s legal framework is in compliance with the requirements of the Convention

The Committee recalls that, since the ratification of the Convention in 2000, it has been asking the Government to implement legislative reforms.

The Committee also notes that following the direct contacts mission, the Government sent to the Head of the direct contacts mission and the ILO drafts of proposed amendments directed at ensuring compliance with the Convention. These will be reviewed below under the relevant Articles of the Convention.

Article 1(1)(a) and (3). Grounds of discrimination and aspects of employment and occupation. Labour Law in the Private Sector. The Committee recalls that in its previous comments it had noted that the Labour Law in the Private Sector of 2012 (Law No. 36/2012) does not apply to “domestic servants and persons regarded as such, including agricultural workers, security house guards, nannies, drivers and cooks” performing work for the employer or the employer’s family members (section 2(b)). It had stressed that sections 39 (discrimination in wages) and 104 (termination considered to be discriminatory) of the Labour Law in the Private Sector do not include race, colour (only mentioned in section 39), political opinion, national extraction and social origin in the list of prohibited grounds of discrimination. Consequently, it had reiterated its request to the Government to take the necessary steps to include in the Labour Law in the private sector a definition of discrimination as well as a prohibition of direct and indirect discrimination that covers all workers, without distinction whatsoever, with respect to all grounds provided for in the Convention, including colour; with respect to all aspects of employment, including access to vocational training, access to employment and to particular occupations, and terms and conditions of employment, and to provide information on any developments in this regard. The Committee also notes the CAS’s conclusions referred to above.

The Committee notes that the Government reiterates its statement that no complaints on discrimination in employment or occupation against nationals or expatriates based on religion, ethnicity, colour, belief or affiliation were filed and that the legal framework in place (Constitution, Labour Law in the Private Sector, Civil Service Law, Penal Code) provides constitutional safeguards directed at achieving justice, equality and non-discrimination. Nevertheless, in 2017, the Committee decided to address the CEACR and CAS’s recommendations, commenced a review of the Labour Law and has drafted proposed amendments for presenting to the National Assembly. The Committee notes that under the terms of the proposed amendments, if enacted, a new section – section 2 bis – will be incorporated into the Labour Law for the Private Sector, as follows: “Discrimination on the grounds of sex, origin, language, religion or belief among the workers who are prescribed by the provisions of this law is hereby prohibited”; and the current section 185 will be slightly modified to refer to section 2 bis as follows: “A penalty of a minimum fine of 200 dinars [approximately US$550] and a maximum of 500 dinars [US$1,326] shall be imposed on any employer or his representative who violates any provisions specified in section 2 bis.” The Committee notes that these two new provisions will introduce protection against discrimination in employment for domestic workers and the like. However, it also notes that these amendments fall short of the legislative reforms expected. As amended, the Labour Law in the Private Sector omits: (i) a comprehensive definition of discrimination; (ii) a prohibition of direct and indirect discrimination; (iii) protection against discrimination in employment and occupation based on all the seven grounds provided for in the Convention (including race, colour, political opinion, national extraction and social origin); and (iv) protection extending to all aspects of employment and particular occupation (including access to vocational training, employment and particular occupations and terms and conditions of employment). It notes that the newly drafted section 185 specifies that sanctions are available when an employer or his/her representative has subjected a worker to discrimination, but not when a worker is subject to discrimination by a co-worker; and that the draft is silent as to the remedies available to the victim.

Public service. The Committee recalls its previous comment, that public sector workers are covered by Civil Service Instruction No. 16/2016 which only prohibits discrimination based on gender, ethnicity, age or religion and its request to the Government that it take the necessary measures to ensure that public officials enjoy adequate protection in practice against direct and indirect discrimination in employment and occupation, with respect to all grounds provided for in the Convention. The Committee notes with concern that the Government’s report is silent on this point and that the proposed amendments communicated to the ILO on 11 October 2018 are limited to the Labour Law in the Private Sector and do not concern the Civil Service Instruction No. 16/2016 which is also not in conformity with the Convention. The Committee wishes to reiterate once again that a clear and comprehensive definition of discrimination in employment and occupation is critical in identifying and addressing the many manifestations in which it may occur (see 2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, paragraph 743). It also wishes to stress that the lack of complaints is not an indicator of the absence of discrimination in practice. It most likely reflects the lack of an appropriate legal framework, a lack of awareness of rights, a lack of confidence in, or the absence of, practical access to procedures, or fear of reprisals. In that regard, the Committee notes that in its findings, the direct contacts mission found that there is low-level awareness as to the procedure for enforcing the prohibitions on discrimination and as to the remedies available. In addition, it notes that in its concluding observations on the initial report of Bahrain dated 26 July 2018, the HRC regretted the lack of comprehensive anti-discrimination legislation covering all the grounds prohibited under the CCPR and expressed concern about the lack of information on effective remedies for victims of discrimination (CCPR/C/BHR/CO/1, paragraph 14). Consequently, the Committee urges the Government to amend both the Labour Law and the Civil Service Law (Civil Service Instruction No. 16/2016 and Legislative Decree No. 48 of 2010) to incorporate a comprehensive definition of all forms of discrimination in accordance with the Convention and to accept the direct contacts mission’s recommendations that the current legal reforms should ensure that both the Labour Law and the Civil Service Law: (i) contain a comprehensive definition of discrimination which should include direct and indirect discrimination and cover the seven grounds listed in the Convention; (ii) cover all categories of workers, including migrant workers, since the Convention is not limited in its scope as regards individuals or branches of activity; (iii) protect against discrimination in all forms of employment and occupation including in access to vocational training, employment and particular occupations and terms of conditions; and (iv) specify the remedies available for victims of discrimination.

Discrimination based on sex. Sexual harassment. The Committee recalls that it had referred to the need to define and prohibit, expressly, sexual harassment in employment and occupation encompassing both: (i) quid pro quo: any physical, verbal or non-verbal conduct of a sexual nature and other conduct based on sex affecting the dignity of women and men which is unwelcome, unreasonable and offensive to the recipient; and a person’s rejection of, or submission to, such conduct is used explicitly or implicitly as a basis for a decision which affects that person’s job; or (ii) hostile work environment: conduct that creates an intimidating, hostile or humiliating working environment for the recipient. It notes that in its 2018 conclusions, the CAS also called upon the Government to ensure that sexual harassment is explicitly prohibited in the civil or labour law and that the necessary steps to introduce preventive measures are taken. The Committee notes that, in an effort to ensure full compliance with the Convention in that regard, the Government asked the ILO for technical assistance on 23 July 2018 and the Office provided the MLSD with such assistance on 13 August 2018. The Committee notes that one of the amendments submitted to the ILO after the direct contacts mission addresses sexual harassment at work. Section 192 bis states that: “A sentence of imprisonment of a maximum of one year or a maximum fine of 100 dinars [approximately $265] shall be imposed on any worker who, in the course of, or for reasons of employment, sexually harasses a co-worker by a gesture, verbal or physical conduct, or by any other means. A sentence of imprisonment for a minimum term of six months or a minimum fine of 500 dinars [$1,326] and a maximum fine of 1,000 dinars [$2,653] shall be imposed, whenever such a crime is committed by the employer or by his representative.” The Committee notes that although this new provision formally prohibits sexual harassment in the labour legislation (in addition to the Penal Code) and prescribes the sanctions available in the case of serious misconduct, it does not include a clear definition of sexual harassment and it only addresses cases where a worker is subject to sexual harassment from a co-worker and not when the perpetrator is a representative of the employer or a client. Once again, the Committee emphasizes that without a clear definition of sexual harassment in employment, it remains doubtful whether the legislation effectively addresses all forms of sexual harassment, both quid pro quo and hostile working environment sexual harassment (see 2012 General Survey, paragraph 791). Recalling once again that sexual harassment is a serious manifestation of sex discrimination and a violation of human rights, the Committee once again urges the Government to take steps to incorporate a comprehensive definition of sexual harassment, both in the Labour Law and the Civil Service Law, and to provide for access to effective remedies. With a view to assessing the dissuasive nature of the sanctions in practice, the Committee asks the Government to provide information on the relationship between the level of fines and the average salary. It also asks the Government to take practical steps to prevent and address sexual harassment in employment and occupation, such as for example, launching awareness-raising campaigns on the subject, encouraging management training on sex-based harassment prevention, or inviting employers to establish formal policies and procedures to deal with sexual harassment, and to provide detailed information in this regard.
Article 2. Equality of opportunity and treatment between women and men. In its previous comments, the Committee had noted the detailed information provided by the Government on steps taken to promote the principle of equal opportunity between men and women in employment and occupation and had asked the Government to provide information on the impact of each of these steps in increasing the number of women in leadership positions and their situation in the labour market, in particular in areas traditionally dominated by men, and updated statistical information on the participation of men and women in the labour market, disaggregated by sector, occupational category and position in both the public and private sectors, and the number of women and men respectively benefiting from vocational training. The Committee notes that the information provided by the Government in this regard does not reply to its request for information on the practical impact of the steps taken by it but merely reiterates the information and statistics communicated in the Government’s previous report. In this regard, the Committee notes the information collected by the direct contacts mission during its meetings in particular with the MoE and the Supreme Council for Women which pointed out the world ranking of the Bahraini education system, the fact that Bahrain has the highest female literacy rate in the Arabian Peninsula (97 per cent of girls are enrolled in primary school and 91 per cent attend secondary school) and one of the highest university gender parity indexes in the region. The Committee notes the outcome of the World Economic Forum (WEF) Global Gender Gap Index (which measures the relative gaps between women and men across four key areas: health, education, economy and politics) which indicates that, in 2015, Bahrain was the Middle East and North Africa region’s most improved country with respect to the Economic Participation [of Women] and Opportunity Sub-Index. It notes too that in its 2017 Report, the WEF ranked Bahrain the region’s best-performing country (along with Tunisia and the United Arab Emirates). The Committee further notes the Government’s Fourth Periodic report (CEDAW/C/BHR/4) submitted by Bahrain in March 2018 to the United Nations Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW) and the detailed account of the measures taken by the country to ensure equality of opportunity and treatment in employment of women. The Committee notes that, although Bahraini women have made big strides and are well qualified, it is still not easy for them to secure access to senior positions in the private sector. Women comprise only 39 per cent of the total workforce and are mostly concentrated in the entry and middle-level management. In this respect, the Committee also notes the concerns of the HRC about the persistence of patriarchal stereotypes regarding the role of women and men in the family and in society and the fact that women are under-represented in political and public life, in particular in decision-making, despite the measures taken to promote gender equality (paragraph 20). The Committee asks the Government to provide information on any proactive measures taken or envisaged to address the underlying causes and de facto inequalities resulting from discrimination deeply entrenched in traditional and societal values. This should include for example information on any special training and coaching programmes for women employees to develop the skills necessary to access senior positions; measures aimed at reconciling work and family responsibilities and avoiding the reinforcement of stereotypes regarding the role of women and men in society and in the family by extending to men measures currently only available to women (for example, part-time work, unpaid leave to look after a child or a dependent relative, paid leave in the event of the death of the husband of a woman worker). Recalling that the effective application of the Convention is an ongoing process requiring a continual cycle of assessment, action, monitoring, further assessment and adjustment, including to address new issues and difficulties, the Committee reiterates its request for information on the impact of all the measures and initiatives adopted in order to increase the number of women in leadership positions and their situation in the labour market, in particular in areas traditionally dominated by men.

Article 3(c). Migrant workers. The Committee recalls that it had asked the Government to provide its comments on the ITUC’s allegations concerning the newly introduced “Flexi scheme” and the kafala or sponsorship system and reiterated its previous request to the Government to provide information on the specific measures adopted to ensure effective protection of all migrant workers, including migrant domestic workers, against discrimination based on all the grounds set out in the Convention. The Committee further asked the Government to ensure that any rules adopted to regulate the rights of migrant workers to change employers do not impose conditions or limitations that could increase the dependency of migrant workers on their employers, and thus increase their vulnerability to abuse and discriminatory practice. It also asked the Government to provide information on the nature and number of cases, disaggregated by sex, occupation and country of origin, where the employer or the Labour Market Regulatory Authority (LMRA) had not approved the transfer of an employee to another employer and on what basis.

The Committee notes the Government’s response that the legal framework provides legal protection to migrant workers with respect to the regulation of labour relations and ensures the rights of all parties, including protection against discrimination in employment and occupation. The Government states that the competent bodies make great efforts to monitor the effective application of the law and to provide support services specifically designed to protect migrant workers, including: (i) mechanisms for filing individual complaints to the MLSD in order to reach amicable settlements; (ii) arrangements allowing for direct contact with the LMRA for migrant workers in several languages; (iii) publication of awareness-raising materials in 14 different languages in cooperation with embassies; (iv) providing migrant workers with the right to transfer from an employer to another, without the consent of the current employer (25,000 approvals in 2017); (v) the introduction of a flexible work permit system (Flexi) from mid-July 2017; (vi) access to an unemployment insurance scheme; (vii) a right of representation in trade unions and federations; (viii) distribution of SIM cards free of charge to keep workers informed in their native language of any developments concerning their work permits and legal status; (ix) introduction of a “National Referral System for Victims of Trafficking in Persons”; (x) creation of a shelter to... support and protect migrant workers in difficult situations; and (xi) periodic meetings with embassies of the countries of origin of migrant workers; etc. As for raising the level of awareness of migrant workers as to their rights, the Government recalls that it is not solely its responsibility to do so but also that of embassies representing the countries of origin, trade unions and civil society organizations related to foreign communities, such as cultural and social clubs. Regarding the ITUC statement that the LMRA continues to allow employers to include in workers’ employment contracts a limitation on the right to transfer to another employer for a specified period, the Government states that a worker’s freedom to transfer to another employer has become a right and that the LMRA does not take into account any conditions set out in an employment contract which limit a worker’s right to transfer to another employer. As for cases where a migrant worker has been subject to abusive practices by his/her employer, he/she can request a transfer without having to observe the fixed conditions and legal deadlines. In addition, the Government points out that to date no such cases have been reported to the LMRA. In reply to the ITUC reference to the kafala or sponsorship system or to the nature of the contractual relationship between a migrant worker and an employer, the Government emphasizes that the question of linking the work permit to a specific employer is a regulatory question and is an ongoing practice in numerous countries in the world. The Government considers that it is not related to discrimination nor is it in contravention of the principles enshrined in the Convention. Further, asking that the migrant workers provide documents which attest to their identity such as a passport or any other document is a necessary procedural step. A migrant worker who does not have a passport for any reason may remedy this through the embassy of his/her country of origin. The Government indicates that migrant workers are also permitted to obtain theoretical and practical training in accordance with employers’ needs. With respect to the Committee’s request that the Government provide information on the nature and number of cases in which request for a transfer to another employer is refused and the basis for this refusal, the Government indicates that the electronic system, which registers transfer requests, does not accept the registration of requests which do not meet the conditions and rules specified in the law. The Government recalls that in addition to the formal mechanisms for the filing of complaints (labour inspection or courts), migrant workers can resort to their embassies, trade unions, and civil society organizations such as, for example, the National Committee for Human Rights. The Government also states that the MLSD pays great attention to training labour inspectors and is currently examining the possibility of establishing a unit specialized in discrimination. With regard to the introduction of a pilot scheme for a Flexi work permit by which migrant workers are allowed to work without a sponsor (subject to fees), the Committee notes the detailed justification given to the direct contacts mission by the Chief Executive Officer of the LMRA according to which the Flexi permit aims to respond to the economic changes in the country and the ever-increasing demand for casual, part-time, and seasonal workers. This pilot scheme is an attempt to move away from the sponsorship system and the periodic amnesties which have not resolved the problem of migrant workers whose status is irregular. In introducing the Flexi permit, the LMRA is endeavouring to tackle the problem of undocumented workers differently. According to the LMRA, undocumented workers often work on their own account or as self-employed workers and thus compete with workers whose status is regular and with small businesses, since they constitute a cheap and flexible workforce. The Government indicates that under this new scheme, a migrant worker who has a Flexi work permit is a worker who is employed in the labour market, and who is subject to all laws which regulate the relationship between an employer and a worker such as the Labour Law in the Private Sector. This new system allows a migrant worker working in unfair conditions to make an independent application for a personal permit enabling him or her to work without being bound to a particular employer, in accordance with the rules, and thus avoid exploitation. A migrant worker is free to select registration within the Flexi work permit system or the normal work permit, while benefiting from the freedom of transferring to another employer.

The Committee notes the observations of the GFBTU and the ITUC regarding the situation of migrant workers in Bahrain, as well as the information provided by the Migrant Workers Protection Society (MWPS) to the direct contacts mission. The ITUC recalls that migrant workers account for about 77 per cent of the workforce in Bahrain and they are mostly in low-skill, low-wage jobs in construction, trade, manufacturing and domestic work. They are excluded from a number of provisions of the labour and social protection laws and as a result the GFBTU and the ITUC allege that migrant workers: (i) are denied decent working conditions; (ii) work in unsafe environments; (iii) work excessively long hours (up to 19 hours a day with minimal breaks and no days off); (iv) are paid extremely low wages (some employers pay wages averaging 70 dinar ($186) per month and often go as low as 50 dinars ($92), which are often unpaid for months); and (v) are excluded from social security benefits, and are only entitled to insurance against work injuries. The situation of domestic workers and particularly women migrant workers is aggravated by the exclusion of private houses from labour inspection. According to the ITUC, from April to July 2018, the number of foreign workers in Bahrain committing suicide increased dramatically. With regard to the Flexi permit scheme, the information provided by the GFBTU, the ITUC and the MWPS indicates that although the scheme was set up initially to help migrant workers regularize their residence status, in practice most of them are excluded from the scheme since: (i) skilled workers, workers who escaped abusive employers, domestic and agricultural workers are not eligible; (ii) its cost is prohibitive (total cost for two years is $1,169 dinars or $3,125 while most of them earn less than 200 dinars or $535 per month); and (iii) one of the conditions is to be in possession of a valid passport, a condition that most of the migrant workers in an irregular situation cannot fulfill since their passports will have been confiscated by their employer. In light of the above, the ITUC states that the real objective of the Flexi work permit scheme is to lower the cost of hiring migrant workers and divert money from the free visa black market to the Government rather than regularizing migrant workers in an irregular situation. The ITUC also stresses that, although the Government states that a migrant worker working under this scheme will still enjoy all the benefits and rights provided by the Labour Law in the Private Sector, it is still not clear which law covers the employment contracts of Flexi permit workers and how this impacts on the labour protections afforded to them. The GFBTU adds that the “Wage improvement protection system” (which requires employers to transfer salaries of employees to a bank) launched by the Government to protect private sector workers may benefit construction workers and other private sector workers but it will not solve the problem of vulnerability faced by domestic workers, particularly housemaids who are not familiar with the bank system and electronic transfers, a statement which was supported by the MWPS. As regard the adoption of the “Tripartite Domestic Workers contract”, which regulates the relationship between the recruitment agency, the employer (the household) and the migrant domestic worker, the aim of which is to prevent the exploitation of domestic workers, this is expected to help guarantee the rights of migrant domestic workers. Employers must now state in detail and in writing, among other things, the nature of the job, the working hours and weekly day off and other conditions of work (accommodation offered, salary, number and ages of household members, etc.). The MWPS explained to the direct contacts mission, however, that in practice this contract is bipartite, between the employment agency and the employer, given that the majority of migrant workers (in particular domestic workers) are illiterate. With regard to the kafala or sponsorship system, both the ITUC and the GFBTU point out that, although the Government has repeatedly stated that migrant workers in Bahrain are not subject to the kafala system and may change employment without the permission of their sponsor, in practice the LMRA continues to allow employers to include in their employment contracts a provision limiting the circumstances in which approval of a transfer to another employer will be granted, in particular by prohibiting transfer within the first 12 months of employment.

The Committee takes note of the steps taken by the Government to ensure better protection for migrant workers in general and domestic workers in particular. However, it regrets that the proposed amendment communicated by the Government on October 2018, aimed at explicitly extending the full protection of the Convention to migrant workers falls short of the Committee’s and CAS’ expectations since the protection against discrimination in employment and occupation afforded to domestic workers and migrant workers does not extend to all the grounds formally prohibited by the Convention. The Committee therefore urges the Government to ensure that the text finally adopted covers all the points listed in its comments above under Articles 1(1)(a) and 3 of the Convention. The Committee reminds the Government of the possibility of availing itself of the technical assistance of the ILO in this regard.

As regards the kafala system, the Committee considers that any move towards de-linking migrant workers from the control of a single sponsor is to be welcomed. However, the information provided to the direct contacts mission and the Committee suggests that the Flexi permit scheme is neither meeting the Government’s expectations nor meaningfully improving mobility for migrant workers as a whole. Noting that the Flexi permit system is a pilot scheme which will be reviewed after a certain period, the Committee urges the Government to address these issues and consider reducing the fees and relaxing the eligibility criteria to enable more migrants to apply for a Flexi permit. As to the remaining aspects of the kafala system limiting migrant workers’ freedom of movement, the Committee asks the Government to prohibit restrictions on a worker’s freedom to change employer, including before expiry of a 12-month period from the date of commencement of the contract and to provide information on any progress made in this regard. In the meantime, the Committee asks the Government to provide information on the implementation of the Flexi permit scheme and its impact on reducing migrant workers’ vulnerability to exploitation. Noting that the ITUC and the GFBTU are questioning the efficiency of the Wage Improvement Protection System and the Tripartite Domestic Worker Contract, the Committee asks the Government to provide information on the implementation in practice of these two measures and to periodically evaluate them in order to monitor their impact on reducing migrant workers’ vulnerability.

Article 3. Special measures of protection. The Committee wishes to recall that protective measures for women may be broadly categorized into those aimed at protecting maternity, in the strict sense, which come within the scope of Article 3, and those aimed at protecting women generally because of their sex or gender based on stereotypical perceptions about their capabilities and appropriate role in society which are contrary to the Convention and constitute obstacles to the recruitment and employment of women (see 2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, paragraph 839). The Committee recalls that it considers that provisions relating to the protection of persons working under hazardous or difficult conditions should be aimed at protecting the health and safety of both men and women at work, while taking account of gender differences with regard to specific risks to their health. Therefore any restrictions on women’s access to work based on health and safety considerations must be justified and based on scientific evidence and, when in place, must be periodically reviewed in the light of technological developments and scientific progress, to determine whether they are still necessary for protection purposes. The Committee also emphasizes the need to adopt measures and put in place facilities to enable workers with family responsibilities, in particular women who continue to bear the unequal burden of family responsibilities, to reconcile work and family responsibilities. Consequently, in its previous comments, the Committee had urged the Government to take steps to ensure that protective measures applicable to women are limited to maternity protection in the strict sense, and to repeal any provisions that constitute an obstacle to the recruitment and employment of women, such as Ministerial Order No. 16 of 2013 (regarding occupations in which, and the circumstances under which, employing women at night is prohibited) and section 1 of Order No. 32 of 2013 (which prohibits women’s employment in certain sectors and occupations) and asked the Government to provide information on the specific steps taken or envisaged in this regard. The Committee welcomes the proposed amendments communicated by the Government in response to the Committee’s request. The draft amendment defines the work in which pregnant and breastfeeding women may not be employed. However, the Committee is of the view that the draft amendment is overgeneralized both for the areas of work and the exposure agents (for example in section 1, the text refers to excessive heat but does not precisely define “excessive”). The draft text also omits certain hazards, for example non-ionizing radiation and UV radiation, among others. Overall, the draft also does not take into account the principles of prevention and protection as provided in ILO instruments on occupational safety and health. In light of the above, while welcoming the decision of the Government to propose amendments to the Ministerial Orders mentioned above, the Committee urges the Government to avail itself of ILO technical assistance in this regard, before adopting the draft amendment, since the draft is inadequate. In the meantime, it asks the Government to review its approach regarding restrictions on women’s employment in light of the above principles to ensure that any protective measures taken are strictly limited to maternity protection, in the strict sense, or based on occupational safety and health risk assessments and do not constitute obstacles to the employment of women, in particular to their access to posts with career prospects and responsibilities. The Committee asks the Government to provide information on any development in this regard.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee notes that the Government’s report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments initially made in 2017.

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Equal remuneration for work of equal value. Legislation. In previous comments, the Committee noted the absence of a legislative framework supporting the right to equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value. Having noted also that the existing mechanisms for collective bargaining and wage councils for wage determination did not seem to promote and ensure effectively this right, the Committee requested the Government to take measures to give full legislative expression to the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value.

The Committee notes from the Government’s report on Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) that the draft National Gender Policy, which includes a section on employment, is currently being reviewed by the relevant ministries but that the Employment (Prevention of Discrimination) Bill is yet to be adopted. The Committee once again recalls the particular importance of capturing in legislation the concept of “work of equal value” in order to address the segregation of men and women in certain sectors and occupations due to gender stereotypes. In light of the ongoing legislative and policy developments on gender equality and non-discrimination, the Committee asks the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value will be fully reflected in the National Gender Policy and in the Employment (Prevention of Discrimination) Bill, and to provide a copy of the policy and the new legislation, once adopted.

Gender earnings gap and occupational segregation. The Committee notes from the statistics published by the Barbados Statistical Service (Labour Force Survey) that of all women employed in 2015, 52.4 per cent earned less than 500 Barbadian dollars (BBD) per week compared to 41.8 per cent of all men employed in that same year. Among those earning between BBD500 and BBD999 per week, men represented almost 56 per cent and women only 44 per cent. Among those earning between BBD1,000 and BBD1,300, women represented 46.6 per cent and men 53.1 per cent. Men also account for a little more than half of the workers (52.5 per cent) in the highest earnings group (over BBD1,300). The Committee further notes from the Labour Force Survey data for 2015 the persistent occupational gender segregation of the economy with women mostly employed as service workers and clerks while men are mostly employed as craft and related workers or plant and machine operators. When looking at economic sectors, women workers are highly represented in “Accommodation and Food Services”, and their numbers sometimes more than doubles or triples the number of male workers in “Finance and Insurance”, “Education” and “Human Health and Social Work”. Women are also over-represented among household employees. In contrast, men largely predominate in the “Construction” and “Transportation and Storage” sectors. The Committee further refers to its comments on Convention No. 111. The Committee asks the Government to take the measures to reduce the earnings gap between men and women and to increase the employment of women in jobs with career opportunities and higher pay. Recalling that wage inequalities may arise due to the segregation of men and women into certain sectors and occupations, the Committee also asks the Government to provide information on the results achieved under the National Employment Policy and the National Gender Policy, once adopted, to address occupational gender segregation and to increase the employment of women in sectors and occupations in which they are under-represented.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request directly addressed to the Government.

The Committee notes that the Government’s report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments initially made in 2017.

Articles 1–3 of the Convention. Legislative protection against discrimination. The Committee had previously noted that the Employment Rights Act 2012, while protecting workers against unfair dismissal on all the grounds enumerated in Article 1(1)(a) and certain additional grounds under Article 1(1)(b) of the Convention, did not ensure full legislative protection against both direct and indirect discrimination for all workers in all aspects of employment and occupation. The Committee previously asked the Government to address the protection gaps in the legislation. The Committee notes that the Government in its report merely restates the constitutional provisions on equality, and the protections afforded by the Employment Rights Act 2012. The Government also notes that no distinctions, exclusions, or preferences based on the prohibited grounds set out in Article 1(1)(a) or on any additional grounds determined in accordance with Article 1(1)(b) exist in the country, and that no discrimination cases have been reported. Regarding the presumed absence of discrimination, the Committee considers that it is essential to acknowledge that no society is free from discrimination, and that continuous action is required to address... determination in employment and occupation, which is both universal and constantly evolving (see 2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, paragraphs 731 and 845). Noting that the Employment (Prevention of Discrimination) Bill 2016 is still in draft form, the Committee urges the Government to take steps, without further delay, to address the protection gaps in the legislation, and to ensure that the anti-discrimination legislation expressly defines and prohibits direct and indirect discrimination in all aspects of employment and occupation, for all workers, and on all the grounds set out in the Convention. The Committee also repeats its request to the Government to provide information on the steps taken to ensure that all workers are being protected in practice against discrimination not only with respect to dismissal but with respect to all aspects of employment and occupation, on the grounds set out in the Convention. Such measures could include public awareness raising aimed at, or in cooperation with, workers and employers and their organizations, or the development of codes of practice or equivalent guidelines to generate broader understanding on the principles enshrined in the Convention. Noting with regret that for several years the Government has not provided any information on the action taken to promote and ensure equality of opportunity and treatment with respect to race, colour and national extraction, and to eliminate discrimination in employment and occupation on these grounds, the Committee urges the Government to provide such information without delay, including any studies or surveys on the labour market situation of the different groups protected under the Convention.

Article 1(1)(a). Discrimination on the grounds of sex. Sexual harassment. The Committee previously noted the absence in the Employment Rights Act 2012 of provisions protecting workers against sexual harassment. The Committee notes the Government’s indication that the proposed Sexual Harassment in the Workplace Bill will define and prohibit both quid pro quo and hostile environment sexual harassment and provide for a tribunal to hear complaints and determine matters related to sexual harassment. The Committee urges the Government to take steps to ensure that the draft Sexual Harassment in the Workplace Bill is adopted speedily and that it will define and prohibit sexual harassment (both quid pro quo and hostile environment harassment) in all aspects of employment and occupation, and asks that the Government provide a copy of the latest version of the Bill, or as enacted, with its next report.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Burundi

Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111)

(ratification: 1993)

The Committee notes the observations from the Trade Union Confederation of Burundi (COSYBU), which were received on 30 August 2018. It requests the Government to provide its comments thereon.

The Committee notes that the Government’s report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments initially made in 2017.

The Committee notes the observations on the application of the Convention made by the Trade Union Confederation of Burundi (COSYBU), which were received on 26 November 2015.

Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention. Discrimination on the basis of sex or gender. Gender-based violence. The Committee notes with interest the adoption of Act No. 1/13 of 22 September 2016 concerning the prevention and suppression of gender-based violence and victim protection, which defines and punishes, inter alia, the concept of gender-based violence, including sexual violence, sexual harassment, gender-hostile traditional practices and economic violence, which is defined as denying a spouse access to family resources or forbidding a spouse to work. The Committee also notes that, under section 14, any employees who are victims of gender-based violence in or outside the workplace have the right, at their request and subject to a doctor’s approval, to a temporary reduction or reorganization of hours of work, to a geographical transfer, to assignment to another workplace, to the suspension of their employment contract (following which the employees can resume their contracts) and to resignation without notice. In this respect, the Committee would like to draw the Government’s attention to the fact that resignation with or without notice must not be used in practice as the only means of ending the violence and obtaining compensation but rather should be a last resort since this would amount to punishing the victims through the loss of their jobs (double penalty). The Committee notes that Act No. 1/13 also provides that “any employer who violates the rights of a person on the basis of his/her sex which are set down in the Labour Code and its implementing regulations, shall be liable to a fine of 500,000 to 1 million Burundian francs”. The Committee asks the Government to provide information on the following points:

(i) the implementation and application in practice of Act No. 1/13 of 22 September 2016 with regard to employment and occupation, indicating the number and type of cases of gender-based violence dealt with by the labour inspectorate and the courts and also the penalties imposed;

(ii) the steps taken or contemplated to inform and raise the awareness of employers, workers and their respective organizations, labour inspectors, judges and also the general public as regards action against gender-based violence, including the steps taken to publicize the content of Act No. 1/13; and

(iii) the activities of the Independent National Human Rights Commission (CNIDH) against gender-based violence in employment.

In addition, the Committee asks the Government to indicate whether it envisages carrying out an inventory of laws that are discriminatory towards women in order to bring them into line with the Constitution and ratified international instruments, as recommended by the CNIDH.

Sexual harassment. The Committee recalls that section 563 of the Penal Code, as amended in 2009, provides a provision defining sexual harassment as “the act of subjecting another person to orders, threats or physical or psychological coercion, or serious pressure, with a view to obtaining favours of a sexual nature by abusing the authority inherent in his or her functions”, but does not cover either hostile work environment sexual harassment or acts committed by a work colleague or a person connected to the job (such as a customer or supplier). The Committee notes that Act No. 1/13 of 2016 defines sexual harassment as “any form of unwanted verbal, non-verbal or physical conduct of a sexual nature, whether between equals or in a hierarchical situation; the act of subjecting another person to orders, threats or physical or psychological coercion, or serious pressure, with a view to obtaining favours of a sexual nature by abusing the authority inherent in his or her functions”. The Committee observes that this definition covers more forms of sexual harassment, including sexual harassment by a person who has no hierarchical connection with the victim. However, it notes that this definition does not cover the concept of a hostile, offensive or humiliating work environment created by certain forms of conduct with sexual connotations. While noting in particular the progress achieved through the adoption of Act No. 1/13 of 2016, the Committee asks the Government to examine the possibility of expanding the definition of sexual harassment by adding the notion of a hostile, offensive or humiliating work environment, and asks it, in the absence of any specific provision towards this end in the Act of 2016, to specify the procedure to be followed and the penalties that apply in cases of sexual harassment. The Committee also asks the Government to provide information on the practical steps taken to prevent and eliminate sexual harassment in the public and private sectors, including measures designed to raise the awareness of employers, workers and their respective organizations with regard to the prevention and treatment of sexual harassment.

Article 2. Equality of opportunity and treatment for men and women. The Committee notes that, according to the National Employment Policy Paper of 2014, some progress has been made on equality but profound inequalities persist in terms of access to initial employment and to managerial posts and as regards conditions of work. These inequalities are due to various forms of discrimination and the social distribution of labour and the exclusive role of women in the area of childcare and domestic tasks. In this regard, the Committee notes that the National Employment Policy states that it will be necessary to encourage enterprises to take steps to achieve a better balance between work and family life and to improve women’s access to productive resources. It also provides for the possibility of establishing a 30 per cent quota for women at all hierarchical levels in the public and semi-public administration on a trial basis, and also for the use of anonymous employment resumés and the promotion of vocational training.

The Committee further notes that Act No. 1/13 of 2016 provides that the Government must formulate and implement a gender policy, submit a report on its implementation to the National Assembly (sections 3 and 4) and adopt awareness-raising measures to “modify structures and models of sociocultural behaviour for men and women to eliminate customary or other practices based on the notion of the inferiority or superiority of either sex or stereotypical roles of men or women” (section 5). The Act establishes the obligation for parents or any other persons in charge of children to give equal treatment to boys and girls in all aspects of life and to protect them against any gender-based violence (section 8). Public authorities must take steps to give girls and boys equal access to education, and school directors must ensure that single mothers’ right to education is respected. In this regard, the Committee notes that the United Nations Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW), in its concluding observations, welcomed the measures adopted by Burundi to increase the school enrolment and retention rates for girls, including the adoption of a policy on the reintegration of girls into school after pregnancy (CEDAW/C/BDI/CO/5-6, paragraph 34). While welcoming all of these provisions and measures, the Committee asks the Government to provide information on their implementation in practice and the results achieved, including with regard to increasing the rate of school enrolment and vocational training for girls and improving women’s access to productive resources and to employment including to managerial posts in the public and private sectors. The Committee also asks the Government to indicate whether a new national gender policy, replacing the one adopted in 2012, has been formulated and, if so, to provide details on those sections relating to gender equality in employment and occupation.

Indigenous peoples. The Committee recalls that it has been drawing the Government’s attention for a number of years to the stigmatization and discrimination faced by the Batwa people and notes that the Government’s report does not contain any information on this matter. The Committee notes that, in their respective concluding observations, CEDAW emphasizes that access to education for Batwa girls is very limited (CEDAW/C/BDI/CO/5-6, paragraph 34(b)) and the United Nations Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights expresses concern at the lack of effective measures for combating the discrimination faced by the Batwa, particularly with regard to ensuring the effective exercise of their economic, social and cultural rights (E/C.12/BDI/CO/1, 16 October 2015, paragraph 15). The Committee urges the Government to take the necessary steps to ensure equal access for the Batwa people to education, vocational training and employment, including to enable them to exercise their traditional activities, and also steps to combat stereotypes and prejudice against this indigenous community and to promote tolerance among all sections of the population. The Committee also asks the Government to provide information on the impact of Act No. 1/07 of 15 July 2016 revising the Forestry Code, which provides that the rational and balanced management of forests be passed, inter alia, on the principle of participation by the grassroots communities, and on the exercise of traditional activities by the Batwa on the land where they live.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government. The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Chad

The Committee notes that the Government’s report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments initially made in 2015.

Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention. Grounds of discrimination. The Committee notes that, according to the Government, the new draft Labour Code has been validated by the High Committee for Labour and Social Security and will be forwarded to the Council of Ministers in the near future. The Government adds that the Committee’s comments have been taken into account and that the draft text has been amended accordingly. The Committee hopes that the Government will soon be in a position to report on the adoption of the new Labour Code and requests it to ensure that it contains provisions explicitly prohibiting any direct or indirect discrimination based, as a minimum, on all the grounds enumerated in Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention, including national extraction and social origin, at all stages of employment and occupation. The Committee requests the Government to provide a copy of the Code as soon as it has been adopted, and of any implementing texts with respect to non-discrimination and equality in employment and occupation.

Discrimination based on sex and equality of treatment between men and women. With reference to its previous observation, the Committee notes the Government’s acknowledgement that section 9 of Ordinance No. 006/PR/84 of 1984, which gives the husband the right to object to his spouse’s activities, is completely outdated. The Committee also notes the Government’s indication that it will take measures to repeal this provision, which no longer corresponds to current realities. With regard to discrimination against women in practice, the Government indicates that occupational segregation between men and women is, among other factors, due to the high levels of illiteracy and social rigidity. The Committee once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures to formally repeal section 9 of the Ordinance of 1984 and to combat actively stereotypes and prejudices concerning the vocational capacities and aspirations of men and women. The Committee also requests the Government to carry out awareness-raising activities for parents and the population as a whole concerning the need for girls and boys to go to and remain in school, and to promote the access of girls and women to a broader range of training courses and occupations, particularly those that are traditionally male.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100) (ratification: 1971)

The Committee notes the observations of the National Association of Fiscal Employees (ANEF), received on 1 September 2018. The Committee also notes the observations of the Single Central Organization of Workers of Chile (CUT-Chile) received on 2 September 2018 and those received on 13 September 2018. The Committee requests the Government to provide its comments in this respect.

Article 1(b) of the Convention. Work of equal value. Legislation. In its previous observation, the Committee noted that various draft laws were currently before the Senate and the Chamber of Deputies aimed at amending section 62 bis of the Labour Code – which requires the employer to comply with the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value – to incorporate the principle of the Convention and ensure equal remuneration for men and women not only in situations in which they perform “the same work”, but also in situations in which they carry out work which is different but nevertheless of equal value, and requested the Government to provide information on any developments in this respect. The Committee notes the Government’s information in its report that a draft law to amend the Labour Code as it pertains to discrimination and equal remuneration between men and women (Bulletin No. 9322-13) is currently undergoing its second constitutional reading in the House of Representatives. The Committee notes that this draft law aims to amend section 62 bis of the Labour Code to expressly set out that “the employer shall comply with the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for the same work or work of equal value”. The Committee trusts that section 62 bis of the Labour Code will be amended shortly and that it will give full effect to the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value as set out in the Convention and requests the Government to provide information on any developments in that respect.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) (ratification: 1971)

The Committee notes the observations of the Single Central Organization of Workers of Chile (CUT-Chile), received on 13 September 2018. The Committee requests the Government to send its comments in this regard.

Article 1 of the Convention. Grounds of discrimination. Legislation. The Committee recalls that, in its previous observation, it referred to Act No. 20609 of July 2012, establishing measures to combat discrimination, which does not include the grounds of colour, national extraction and social origin among the prohibited grounds of discrimination. However, these criteria are contained in section 2 of the Labour Code. In the same observation, the Committee noted the information on relevant case law provided by the Government, including the case law harmonization ruling of the Supreme Court of 5 August 2015, in which the Supreme Court extends the criteria of discrimination envisaged in the fourth subparagraph of section 2 of the Labour Code to all types of arbitrary discrimination and differences prohibited by article 19(16) of the Political Constitution (any discrimination that is not based on the capacity or suitability of the individual) and by the Convention, and states that the criteria of discrimination cannot claim to be exhaustive, as they are narrower than the protection afforded by the constitutional provision. While noting this information, the Committee asked the Government to provide information on the effect given in practice to Act No. 20609 and the case law harmonization ruling of the Supreme Court of 5 August 2015. The Committee notes that, in its report, the Government provides extensive information on court decisions on cases of discrimination that refer to section 2 of the Labour Code, including the ruling of the Supreme Court of 10 July 2015, issued in Case No. 24.386-2014, in which the Court reiterates that the list of grounds of discrimination prohibited in section 2 of the Labour Code “should not be regarded as exhaustive but, rather, as a list that specifies suspicious criteria the presence of which in the present case implies a violation of the mandate of non-discrimination at work contained in article 19(16) of the Fundamental Charter”. The Committee also takes note of Act No. 20940 modernizing the labour relations system, published on 8 September 2016, which extends the list of grounds of discrimination contained in section 2 of the Labour Code. It notes with interest that this Act adds the following grounds in relation to Article 1(1)(b) of the Convention: socioeconomic situation, language, beliefs, participation in trade union organizations, family background, personal appearance, disease or disability. While noting this information, and recalling the importance of guaranteeing that all persons have a clear legal basis for asserting their right to equality of opportunity and treatment in employment or occupation, the Committee once again requests the Government to: (i) clarify how the provisions of the Labour Code and Act No. 20609 are coordinated in practice in terms of the grounds established and the remedies available to victims of discrimination in employment and occupation; and (ii) send information on the application in practice of Act No. 20609.

Discrimination based on sex. Legislation. The Committee recalls that it has been referring for many years to the need to amend section 349 of the Code of Commerce with a view to granting equal rights to spouses to conclude a commercial partnership agreement, so that women who when entering into marriage did not choose the separate property regime can conclude a commercial partnership agreement without the need for special authorization from their husband. In its previous observation, the Committee noted that section 5(5) of the Bill to amend the Civil Code and other legislation provides for the amendment of section 349 of the Code of Commerce and removes the requirement for the authorization of the husband for a wife to be able to enter into a commercial partnership agreement, and asked the Government to send information on any developments relating to the adoption of the Bill. The Committee notes the Government’s indication that the amendment of the marriage regime has been included in the Gender Equity Agenda presented by the President on 23 May 2018 and that the above-mentioned Bill to amend the Civil Code and other legislation is being processed. The Committee observes that, according to the website of the House of Representatives of Chile, the Bill is going through its second constitutional procedure in the Senate. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the passage of the Bill and to supply it with a copy of the Act once it is promulgated.

Sexual orientation. The Committee also notes with interest that Act No. 20940 of 2016 adds “sexual orientation” and “gender identity” as prohibited grounds of discrimination. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the application of these provisions in practice.

Article 2. Conditions of work and remuneration. In its previous observation, the Committee referred to the observations made by the Federation of Unions of Supervisors Rol A and Professionals of CODELCO Chile (FESUC), which refer to: (i) workers recruited by the enterprise after 2010, the majority of whom are women, receive lower pay and do not benefit from the same working conditions as those recruited previously; and (ii) the code of conduct of the enterprise, which discourages political activities by employees, even outside working time. The Committee noted the Government’s reply and asked the Government to continue to provide information in this regard. The Committee notes the Government’s indication that, according to the enterprise, its pay and benefits policy is based on objective criteria, according to the operational reality of each of its divisions, their size, productivity, and the conditions of the copper market. The enterprise indicates that one of the pillars of its Corporate Policy on People Management is “systems of compensation, benefits and recognition based on merit, and job evaluation systems that safeguard equality of opportunity, internal equity and external competitiveness” (pillar 6), and that remuneration is “agreed” by the primary unions that form FESUC and the various divisions of the enterprise. With respect to the situation of women workers in particular, the enterprise indicates that it has established a policy to close persistent gender gaps in the workplace and is making efforts to increase women’s participation in the world of work and to promote the value of women’s contribution to the productivity of enterprises. As a result of these efforts, the enterprise has four workplaces that have earned the Equal-Conciliation Seal (Sello Igualdad-Conciliación) awarded by Chile’s National Service for Women and Gender Equity. The enterprise adds that there are two industrial instruments in its divisions that are designed to ensure compliance with the policies for equality of treatment between men and women within the corporation: (i) Internal Regulations on Order, Health and Safety, which establish the right to equal pay and prescribe safeguard procedures for workers in the event of a violation; and (ii) an internal system through which workers or third parties may file complaints – which can be signed or anonymous – in the event of a violation of the legal regulations, policies, procedures, code of conduct or any other regulations applicable to the enterprise, its workers, its relations with contractors and with third parties. The enterprise reports that, at the date of issuance of the report, no discrimination-related infringements had been observed within its divisions. With regard to the enterprise’s code of conduct, the enterprise points out that no complaints have been received regarding political activities. The Committee notes that, according to the Government, all of the above demonstrates that the enterprise respects the specific and non-specific labour rights of its workers, by applying the principle of equality of treatment and respecting the political rights of those who provide services to the corporation.

Pensions. In its previous comments, the Committee referred to the observations made by various social partners, according to which the current private pensions system, which is based on a fully funded system, discriminates against women through the use of differentiated mortality scales for men and women. It also noted the adoption on 29 April 2014 of Supreme Decree No. 718 creating the Presidential Advisory Commission on the Pensions System. The Committee observed that the proposals contained in the final report of the Presidential Advisory Commission of September 2015 included the elimination of the calculation of differentiated mortality scales by sex and their replacement by unisex scales based on a uniform calculation of life expectancy. The Committee asked the Government to provide information on: (i) the real impact of the use of differentiated mortality scales from their introduction up to the present time on the specific amounts of the benefits received by pensioners; and (ii) the action taken as a result of the final report of the Presidential Advisory Commission on the Pensions System in relation to the elimination of the calculation of differentiated mortality scales by sex. The Committee notes the Government’s indication that the real impact of the use of differentiated mortality scales by sex cannot be assessed, as their use remains a proposed measure. Moreover, the Government reports that, on 1 July 2016, the authority responsible for monitoring pensions (Superintendencia de Pensiones (SP)) and the authority responsible for monitoring securities and insurance (Superintendencia de Valores y Seguros (SVS)) published new mortality scales, with the technical assistance of the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development (OECD).
and following consultations with the National Institute of Statistics (INE) and the Latin American and Caribbean Demographic Centre (CELADE). The Committee observes that General Regulations SP No. 162 and SVS No. 398 of 20 November 2015, issued by the authorities responsible for monitoring pensions and securities and insurance, which establish the mortality scales published in July 2016, provide for the use of five differentiated mortality scales by sex. The Committee notes, on the other hand, that a proposal to amend the national legislation on pensions has been presented to Congress. The Committee wishes to highlight that factors, such as a labour force participation rate for women that is considerably lower than the rate for men, the use of differentiated mortality scales by sex (instead of unisex mortality scales) and the absence of provisions which allow periods during which parental responsibilities are exercised to be included in the calculation of pensions, have a negative impact on women’s pension levels, which is further aggravated in funded pension systems in which the amount of benefits depends on the contributions made by workers during their working lives. The Committee urges the Government to take the opportunity presented by the legislative reform under way to ensure that unisex mortality scales are included and otherwise guarantee the principle of equality between men and women in terms of pensions, and requests the Government to provide information on any developments in this regard.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100) (ratification: 1999)
The Committee notes that the Government’s report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments initially made in 2017.

Articles 1 and 2(a) of the Convention. Principle of equal remuneration for men and women workers for work of equal value. Laws and regulations. The Committee recalls that, since 2005, it has been drawing the Government’s attention to the need to amend sections 80(1) and 56(7) of the Labour Code, which limit the application of the principle of equal remuneration to the existence of “equal working conditions, qualifications and output” (section 80(1)) or to “equal work” (section 56(7)), and do not reflect the notion of “work of equal value”. The Committee notes that the Government reiterates that amendments to sections 80(1) and 56(7) of the Labour Code are envisaged to ensure that the concept of “work of equal value” is binding. Noting the Government’s commitment, the Committee requests it to ensure, within the framework of the ongoing revision of the Labour Code, that the principle of equal remuneration for men and women workers for work of equal value set out in the Convention is set out in the Labour Code.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Articles 1–3 of the Convention. Protection against discrimination. Legislation. For many years the Committee has been emphasizing the shortcomings in the Labour Code and the General Civil Service Regulations regarding the protection of workers against discrimination, since these texts do not cover all of the grounds of discrimination or all the aspects of employment and occupation set out in the Convention. The Committee recalls that the Labour Code only covers the grounds of “origin”, gender, age and status in relation to wage discrimination (section 80) and the grounds of opinion, trade union activity, membership or not of a political, religious or philosophical group or a specific trade union in relation to dismissal (section 42). The General Civil Service Regulations prohibit any distinction between men and women in relation to their general application and any discrimination on the basis of family situation in relation to access to employment (sections 200 and 201). The Committee notes the Government’s indication that a preliminary draft of a new Bill amending and supplementing certain provisions of the Labour Code will take into account the grounds of discrimination set out in Article 1(1)(a). The Committee asks the Government to ensure that, within the framework of the ongoing revision of the Labour Code, discrimination on all of the grounds set out in the Convention is explicitly prohibited, as well as discrimination on any other grounds which it considers appropriate to include in the Code, at all stages of employment and occupation, including recruitment. The Committee also asks the Government to take the necessary measures to amend the provisions of the General Civil Service Regulations in order to ensure that civil servants are protected as a minimum in relation to the grounds set out in Article 1(1)(a) in respect of all aspects of employment, including recruitment and promotion. The Committee also requests the Government to provide information on any legislative developments in this respect.

Article 1(1)(a). Discrimination based on sex. Sexual harassment. The Committee notes that the United Nations Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW) expressed deep concern at the high prevalence of violence against women and girls, especially sexual harassment at school and at work, the delay in adopting a comprehensive law to combat all forms of violence against women and the lack of awareness regarding this issue and of reporting of gender-based violence (CEDAW/C/COG/CO/6, 23 March 2012, paragraph 23). The Committee notes the Government’s indication that, since 2011, the new draft Bill amending and supplementing certain provisions of the Labour Code has contained provisions against sexual harassment. The Committee once again asks the Government to ensure that provisions covering both quid pro quo harassment and sexual harassment which creates a hostile, intimidating or offensive environment are adopted and that they protect the victims of sexual harassment and establish penalties for the perpetrators. The Committee also asks the Government to take steps, in collaboration with employers’ and workers’ organizations, to prevent and combat sexual harassment, such as awareness-raising measures for employers and workers as well as for labour inspectors, lawyers and judges, and to establish information systems and complaints procedures which take into account the sensitive nature of this issue in order to bring an end to these practices and allow victims to exercise their rights without losing their jobs.
The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

_The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future._

Democratic Republic of the Congo

Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100) (ratification: 1969)

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Equal remuneration for work of equal value. Definition of remuneration.

_Legislation._ For over 20 years, the Committee has been asking the Government to amend the Labour Code, in particular section 86 thereof, which provides for equal wages only for equal conditions of work, qualifications and output, in order to incorporate the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value and to ensure that this principle applies to all components of remuneration as defined in Article 1(a) of the Convention. The Committee notes with regret that the Government has not taken the opportunity provided by the revision of the Labour Code in 2016 to bring it into line with the principle established by the Convention. The Committee wishes to recall that the full application of the Convention involves examining the issue of equality at two levels: first, at the level of the job (is the work of equal value?); and, second, at the level of the remuneration (is the pay received by women and men equal?). The concept of “work of equal value” is fundamental for enabling a broad scope of comparison between different jobs or types of work. It also enables a comparison not only of the same or similar work, but also of work done by women and men which is of an entirely different nature but nevertheless of equal value. Hence account can be taken of the fact that, in practice, certain jobs and occupations are held predominantly by women and others by men. Comparing the relative value of jobs in occupations which may involve different types of skills, responsibilities or working conditions, but which are nevertheless of equal value overall, is essential in order to eliminate pay discrimination resulting from the failure to recognize without gender bias the value of work performed by women and men. For example, the principle of equal pay for men and women for work of equal value has been applied in some countries to compare the remuneration received by men and women engaged in different occupations, such as wardens in sheltered accommodation for the elderly (predominantly women) and security guards in office premises (predominantly men); or school meal supervisors (predominantly women) and garden and park supervisors (predominantly men).

As regards the definition of the term “remuneration” established in Article 1(a) of the Convention, the Committee recalls that section 7.8 of the Labour Code as amended in 2016, still excludes health care, housing and housing allowances, transport allowances, statutory family allowances, travel costs and “emoluments granted solely to assist workers in performing their duties”. The Committee notes the Government’s indication in its report that the purpose of excluding these elements from the definition of “remuneration” is to make them non-taxable and that this exclusion therefore benefits the workers. The Committee recalls that a broad definition of remuneration is necessary since if only the basic wage were being compared, much of what can be given a monetary value arising out of the job would not be captured. Such additional components, which are often considerable and make up increasingly more of the overall earnings package, can give rise to inequalities in pay between men and women. The Committee considers that the non-taxation of the benefits referred to in section 7.8 is not incompatible with also ensuring that the definition of “remuneration” applies the principle of equal pay for men and women for work of equal value by including “the ordinary, basic or minimum wage or salary and any additional emoluments whatsoever payable directly or indirectly, whether in cash or in kind, by the employer to the worker and arising out of the worker’s employment”. _The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary steps to revise the Labour Code in order to ensure that the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value is explicitly included in it and that it applies to all components of remuneration as defined in Article 1(a) of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on all measures taken in this regard._

(ratification: 2001)

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Protection of workers against discrimination on all grounds covered by the Convention in all aspects of employment and occupation. Legislation. Public and private sectors. As regards the civil service, the Committee notes with interest the introduction into Act No. 16/013 of 15 July 2016 issuing the staff regulations for state civil servants which repealed the previous law (Act No. 81/003 of 17 July 1981) of general provisions on discrimination, whereby “employees shall be able to perform without discrimination the jobs to which they are assigned” (section 19) and “there shall be no discrimination between candidates on grounds other than those specified or authorized by the legislation” (section 87). However, the Committee notes with regret that the Government has not taken the opportunity afforded by the adoption of Act No. 16/010 of 15 July 2016 (which amends and supplements Act No. 015-2002 that issues the Labour Code), to incorporate into the Code provisions defining and prohibiting any form of discrimination based as a minimum on all the grounds set out in the Convention and covering all aspects of employment and occupation, including recruitment. In this regard, it notes the Government’s indications that even though no new revision of the Labour Code is envisaged for the moment, it proposes to include the definition of direct and indirect discrimination in employment and occupation in national legislation, in conformity with the Convention. _The Committee_ once again asks that the Government adopt the necessary measures in the near future to ensure that all direct or indirect discrimination, based as a minimum on all the grounds set forth in the Convention and covering all aspects of employment and occupation, is defined and explicitly prohibited by the Labour Code. The Committee asks the Government to provide information on any procedure established to deal with cases of discrimination against public employees or candidates for a post in the civil service and on any case of discrimination which has been reported and dealt with.

Article 1(1)(a). Discrimination based on sex. Legislation. In its previous comments, the Committee urged the Government to take the necessary steps to address the inferior position of women in society. With regard to the legislation, the Committee underlined the discriminatory nature of sections 448 and 497 of Act No. 87/010 of 1 August 1987 issuing the Family Code, and section 8(8) of Act No. 81/003 of 17 July 1981 issuing the staff regulations of state civil servants, under which a married woman is obliged to obtain permission from her husband in order to work. The Committee notes with satisfaction that: (i) further to the adoption of Act No. 008 of 15 July 2016 amending the Family Code, section 448 has been amended and now provides that “spouses must agree on all legal acts in which they assume an obligation to perform a certain task” and, according to the new section 449 “in the event of a persisting disagreement, the spouse who suffers prejudice can seize the tribunal”; and furthermore, section 497, on goods the woman has acquired through the exercise of a profession, has been repealed; and (ii) further to the adoption of Act No. 16/013 of 15 July 2016 issuing the staff regulations for state civil servants, section 8(8) of the former regulations has been repealed and consequently the husband’s permission is no longer required in order for a woman to take up work (section 5 of the new regulations).

Moreover, the Committee notes with interest the adoption of Act No. 15/013 of 1 August 2015 on the implementation of women’s rights and gender parity, which aims, inter alia, to eliminate all forms of discrimination against women and to protect and promote their rights in all areas, inter alia, in the social, economic, political, administrative, cultural, judicial and safety-related spheres. The above-mentioned Act establishes the general legal framework enabling the adoption of specific measures to combat discrimination towards women and to promote gender equality. As regards discrimination, the Committee notes that the Act contains a definition of discrimination which reflects that in Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention. The Act also explicitly states that “discrimination between workers on the basis of sex, particularly on the grounds of marital status or family situation, or on the grounds of pregnancy is prohibited” (section 20). The Committee notes that “... the prohibition of all discrimination applies to any harmful practice connected in particular with recruitment, assignment of tasks, working conditions, remuneration and other social benefits, promotion and termination of the employment contract” (section 21). According to the Act, the State must take “steps to eliminate any practice that is harmful to the rights of women in respect of the ownership, management, administration, enjoyment and disposition of property” (section 9). It also provides that the State must take “appropriate measures to modify patterns and models relating to the socio-cultural behaviour of women and men, through education of the general public, in order to eliminate all harmful cultural practices and practices based on the notion of the inferiority or superiority of either sex or based on stereotypical assumptions concerning the roles of women and men” (section 24). Further, it prohibits all gender stereotypes or preconceptions at all levels of education, particularly in educational guidance and career choices (section 11). The Committee also notes that the United Nations Human Rights Committee, having emphasized the persistence of gender stereotyping in its recent concluding observation, asked the Government to take steps “to strengthen education and awareness-raising initiatives for the general public, including traditional leaders, to combat traditional practices that are discriminatory and harmful to women and to eliminate gender stereotypes on the subordination of women to men and on the respective roles and responsibilities of women and men in the family and society” (CCPR/C/COD/CO/4, 30 November 2017, paragraphs 15 and 16). Considering that all these legislative provisions constitute significant progress in combating discrimination against women in education, vocational training and guidance, employment and occupation, the Committee asks the Government to adopt specific measures giving effect to Act No. 15/013 of 1 August 2015 on the implementation of women’s rights and gender parity, in order to eliminate all forms of discrimination, particularly measures aimed at eliminating all practices based on the notion of the inferiority or superiority of either sex, stereotypical notions on the roles of women and men, and gender stereotypes relating to education and educational guidance. The Government is also asked to provide detailed information on the steps envisaged to eliminate all practices that are harmful to women’s rights in relation to the ownership, management, administration, enjoyment and disposition of property, as provided for in the Act of 2015.

Discrimination based on sex. Leave in the civil service. The Committee notes with regret that the Government has not taken the opportunity afforded by the adoption of Act No. 16/013 of 15 July 2016 issuing the staff regulations for state civil servants (which repeals the former regulations issued by Act No. 81/003 of 17 July 1981) to amend section 25(2), under which female employees who have taken maternity leave cannot claim their right to full annual leave during the same year. It observes that section 30 of the new regulations reproduces section 25(2) of the former regulations in an identical form. The Committee asks the Government to take the necessary steps to amend section 30 of Act No. 16/013 of 15 July 2016 in order to abolish all discrimination on the basis of sex in respect of leave in the public service.

Discrimination based on race or ethnic origin. Indigenous peoples. For a number of years, the Committee has highlighted the marginalization and discrimination of indigenous “pygmy” peoples in relation to the enjoyment of their economic, social and cultural rights, particularly with regard to access to education, health and the labour market, and has urged the Government to take measures to guarantee equality of opportunity and treatment for indigenous peoples in... employment and occupation. The Committee has in particular, referred to the concluding observations of the United Nations Committee on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination (CERD). The Committee notes with regret that the Government indicates once again that indigenous peoples benefit from all the rights guaranteed by the Constitution and that it refers to the Forestry Code of 29 April 2002 (sections 36–44), which, the Government states, guarantees to indigenous peoples and local communities the right to benefit fully from their forest resources and from socio-economic infrastructures that may result, where applicable, from a forestry concession contract concluded between the State and a logging company. Furthermore, the Committee observes that the Government does not mention anymore the bill aiming at ensuring the protection of indigenous peoples, which, according to its previous report, was under examination by Parliament. It also notes that the UN Human Rights Committee (HRC) has expressed concern at: “(a) the overall situation of insecurity and vulnerability of pygmy communities; (b) reports that these communities are discriminated against, particularly in the areas of health care and education; and (c) the State party’s position that indigenous peoples are subsumed under the category of “local communities” in legislation, particularly in the Forestry Code”. The HRC has also expressed concern at the delay in adopting the law on the rights of indigenous peoples and deplored the serious human rights violations and forced displacement suffered by “pygmy” communities in the province of Tanganyika (CCPR/C/COD/CO/4, 30 November 2017, paragraphs 49 and 50). In its 2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, the Committee indicates that it strongly encourages countries to assess the situation in employment and occupation of all ethnic groups in their country, in particular indigenous and tribal peoples, and in the discrimination faced by them, and to supply such information in their reports under article 22 of the Constitution (paragraph 772). It also recalls that a true policy of equality must also include measures to correct de facto inequalities of which certain categories of the population are victims and take into account their specific needs. The Committee therefore once again urges the Government to take measures without delay, including through legislation: (i) to combat prejudices and stereotypes of which indigenous peoples are victims and to raise other population groups’ awareness of their culture and way of life so as to promote equality of treatment and mutual tolerance; (ii) to allow indigenous peoples access, on an equal footing with other members of the population, to all levels of education, vocational training and employment, and to resources, particularly land, which enable them to carry out their traditional and subsistence activities; and (iii) to ensure that members of indigenous peoples employed in agriculture are treated on an equal footing with other members of the population in terms of conditions of employment, including remuneration. The Committee asks the Government to indicate whether it still plans to adopt a law to protect indigenous peoples and, if so, to provide detailed information on the progress made in the legislative process and the contents of the bill.

Article 1(1)(b). Legislation. Protection against discrimination. Dismissal. Recalling that section 62 of the Labour Code prohibits any dismissal on the grounds of race, colour, sex, marital status, family responsibilities, pregnancy, childbirth and the post-natal period, religion, political views, national extraction, social origin or ethnic group, the Committee notes with interest the incorporation of “real or perceived HIV/AIDS status” into this list of prohibited grounds, following the adoption of Act No. 16/010 of 15 July 2016 amending and supplementing Act No. 015-2002 issuing the Labour Code. The Committee asks that the Government provide information on any cases of dismissal based on the aforementioned grounds that have been dealt with by the labour inspectorate or the courts. The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Equatorial Guinea

The Committee notes with deep concern that the Government’s report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments initially made in 2008. The Committee notes that the Government did not take the opportunity provided by the enactment of the Fundamental Act of Equatorial Guinea, on 16 February 2012, and of the General Labour Reforms Act (No. 10/2012), on 24 December 2012, to address the matters raised by the Committee.

Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention. Prohibited grounds of discrimination. The Committee notes that section 15 of the Fundamental Act of 2012 (previously section 15 of the Fundamental Act of 1995) provides that any bias or discrimination on tribal, ethnic, gender-related, religious, social, political or any other similar grounds, when duly ascertained, is punishable by law. Further, under section 1(3)(d) of the General Labour (Reforms) Act of 2012 (previously section 1(4) of the General Labour Act, 1990) the State guarantees equality of opportunity and treatment in employment and occupation and provides that no one may be subjected to discrimination, that is, to any distinction, exclusion or preference on grounds of race, colour, sex, political opinion, national extraction, social origin or trade union affiliation. The Committee notes that while section 1(3)(d) of the General Labour (Reforms) Act of 2012, continues to omit reference to religion as one of the prohibited grounds of discrimination, that ground is included in section 15 of the Fundamental Act of 2012. The Committee recalls that where provisions are adopted in order to give effect to the principles in the Convention, they should include at least all of the grounds of discrimination laid down in Article 1(1)(a) (see 2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, paragraph 853). The Committee therefore urges the Government to take steps to add the ground of “religion” to the list of prohibited grounds of discrimination at the earliest opportunity. The Committee once again asks the Government to provide information on the practical application of section 15 of the Fundamental Act of 2012, and of section 1(3)(d) of the General Labour (Reforms) Act of 2012, and to indicate whether any administrative or judicial decisions have been handed down concerning these provisions, and if so, to provide details thereof.
The Committee notes that the Government’s report contains no reply to its previous comments. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments initially made in 2015.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

The Committee notes with regret that the Government’s report does not reply to the issues raised in the Committee’s previous observation. It must therefore repeat its previous comments initially made in 2012.

Follow-up to the conclusions of the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards (International Labour Conference, 100th Session, June 2011)

In its previous observation and in the absence of a report, the Committee recalled that a discussion has taken place in the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards in June 2011. In the resulting conclusions, the Conference Committee urged the Government to ensure that the principles contained in the People’s Charter for Change, Peace and Progress adopted in 2008 were translated into concrete action, and called upon the Government: (i) to amend or repeal all racially discriminatory laws and regulations, including the Education (Establishment and Registration of Schools) Regulations, 1966; (ii) to effectively address discriminatory practices; and (iii) to ensure equality in employment, training and education for all persons of all ethnic groups. The Conference Committee also addressed the right of government employees to non-discrimination and equality in employment, as well as the low labour force participation of women, and asked that measures be taken. The Conference Committee also noted concerns regarding the difficulty in exercising the right to freedom of association in the country, and called on the Government to establish the conditions necessary for genuine tripartite dialogue, with a view to addressing the issues related to the implementation of the Convention.

The Committee notes that the Government has not replied to the latter point and asks the Government to provide specific and detailed information in this regard.

Article 1(1) of the Convention. Protection against discrimination. Public service. Legislation. The Committee recalls that further to the adoption of the Employment Relations (Amendment) Decree 2011 (Decree No. 21 of 2011) on 13 May 2011, government employees, including teachers, were excluded from the scope of the Employment Relations Promulgation of 2007 (ERP) and thus from its non-discrimination provisions. As regards employees excluded, and in general persons employed in the public service, the Committee welcomes the adoption of the Public Service (Amendment) Decree 2011 (Decree No. 36 of 2011) on 29 July 2011, which inserts in the Public Service Act 1999 new Parts 2A and 2B respectively on Fundamental Principles and Rights of Work and Equal Employment Opportunity. The Committee notes that Article 26 of the ERP declares that discrimination based on nationality, race, colour, religion, origin, sex, or social status, as well as discrimination based on origin, possession, or status of birth, is prohibited in the employment, discrimination based on ethnicity, colour, gender, religion, national extraction and social origin, omitting however, political opinion. The Committee notes that section 10C of prohibited grounds of discrimination, whether direct or indirect, also refers to all the grounds of Article 1(1) of the Convention except for political opinion. The Committee recalls that where legal provisions are adopted to give effect to the principle of the Convention, they should include at least all the grounds of discrimination specified in Article 1(1) of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to include political opinion among the prohibited grounds of discrimination listed in the Public Service Act 1999. The Committee also requests the Government to indicate how public service employees and applicants to public service employment are protected against discrimination based on political opinion in practice.

The Committee recalls that the Conference Committee noted that section 3 of Decree No. 21 of 2011 prohibits any action, proceeding, claim or grievance “which purports to or purported to challenge or involves the Government …, any Minister or the Public Service Commission … which has been brought by virtue of or under the [Employment Relations Promulgation]” and that it urged the Government to ensure that government employees had access to competent judicial bodies to claim their rights and to adequate remedies. While noting the Government’s indication regarding the jurisdiction of the High Court to hear any application for judicial review of the decisions of the Public Service Commission concerning termination of government employees, the Committee notes that the Government has indicated that all information available to workers excluded from the scope of the ERP, alleging discrimination in employment or occupation which purport to challenge or involve public authorities. The Government is requested to provide information on the number of complaints submitted, the grounds invoked, the remedies granted and the sanctions imposed.

Article 1. Equal access to education and vocational training. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that the education system was to undergo an extensive reform and requested the Government to indicate whether the Education (Establishment and Registration of Schools) Regulations, 1966, which provide that in the admission process preference may be given to a particular race or creed, was still in force. According to the Government’s report, a draft new Education Act, that will repeal the Education Act and all its subordinate legislation, including the 1966 Regulations, is being prepared. The Committee recalls in this regard that access to education and to a wide range of vocational training courses is of paramount importance to achieving equality in the labour market (2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, paragraph 750). The Committee trusts that the Government will take the necessary measures to ensure the equal access of boys and girls, men and women from all ethnic groups to education and vocational training, and asks the Government to provide information on the measures taken to implement the reform of the educational system, including the adoption of the new Education Decree, and the results achieved. It requests the Government to clarify whether under section 26(3) of the draft Education Decree, the grounds of race, age, disability or religion can still be invoked, possibly in combination with other grounds, as one of the reasons to deny admission to school and to specify the grounds, if any, on the basis of which admission may be denied. The Committee reiterates its previous request for statistical information on the number of schools still applying race or creed as an admission requirement as well as the number of pupils enrolled in these schools.

Article 2. National policy to promote equality of opportunity and treatment irrespective of race, colour and national extraction. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the adoption on 15 December 2008 by the National Council for Building a Better Fiji (NCBBF) of the People’s Charter for Change, Peace and Progress, which aims to build a society based on equality of opportunity for all Fiji citizens and on peace. It further noted that the Charter also contains specific measures concerning indigenous peoples and their institutions and that a number of recommendations were made by the NCBBF, such as the need to promulgate legislation prohibiting discrimination based on race, religion and sexual orientation, as well as legislation protecting the rights of ethnic minority groups (Indians, Pacific Islanders, Chinese, European and landless Fijians), especially with a view to improving access to land. As far as implementation is concerned, the Committee notes from the Government’s report that racial and inappropriate categorization and profiling in governmental records is being removed, the education system is being reformed and the name “Fijian” is to be applied to all citizens of Fiji while the name “i-Taukei” is used to designate indigenous Fijians who represent around 60 per cent of the population of Fiji. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on the concrete measures taken to implement the People’s Charter for Change, Peace and Progress with a view to prohibiting and eliminating discrimination, in particular racial discrimination, and to promote equal opportunities for all, including minority groups, in relation to access to education, vocational training, employment and various occupations. The Government is requested to provide information on any action or programmes undertaken by the Ministry for i-Taukei Affairs to promote equality in employment and occupation, including awareness-raising campaigns promoting tolerance between all components of the population.

Affirmative action. The Committee notes the Government’s indication that it has decided to replace the old affirmative action scheme in favour of indigenous peoples by a new “action scheme across all the races based on a means test” as part of the reform undertaken to develop and implement inclusive, non-discriminatory and non-race based policies towards the goal of common citizenry. It further notes that scholarship schemes that used to be race-based have been discontinued. The Committee requests the Government to provide detailed information on the new action scheme envisaged and its implementation in the fields of education, vocational training, employment and occupation, indicating how it intends to remedy de facto inequalities, redress the effects of past discriminatory practices and promote equal opportunities for all. Please specify if the new scheme provides for monitoring and assessment mechanisms.

Gender equality. The Committee notes the statistics regarding the participation rate of women on a number of bodies, such as the Employment Relations Advisory Board (29 per cent), the National Occupational Safety and Health Advisory Board (13 per cent) and the Wages Council (20 per cent). The Government states that it aims to reach a participation rate of 30 per cent of women on employment and industrial relations bodies. The Committee further notes that the statistical data on the labour force provided by the Government are not disaggregated by sex and therefore do not give sufficient information on the participation of women and men in the labour market. The Committee notes that, in its concluding observations, the United Nations Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW), while welcoming the new Women’s Plan of Action (2010–19), again expressed concern at the persistence of practices and traditions, as well as strong patriarchal attitudes and deep-rooted stereotypes, regarding the roles, responsibilities and identities of women and men in all spheres of life. The Committee notes CEDAW’s concerns about the insufficient financial and human resources allocated to the national machinery for the advancement of women, as well as regarding the high number of women in the informal economy with no social security or other benefits and the unequal de facto situation of rural women in terms of access to land and credit (CEDAW/C/FJI/CO/4, 30 July 2010, paragraphs 6, 16, 17, 20, 21, 28, and 30). The Committee requests the Government to provide detailed information on the concrete measures taken to promote effectively gender equality in employment and occupation, in the framework of the new Women’s Plan of Action or otherwise, including measures taken to address gender stereotypes and improve the access of women to occupations traditionally held by men, through education and training, as well as measures taken to improve the access of women to land and credit. It also requests the Government to indicate the measures taken to increase the participation of women on employment and industrial relations bodies, and the results achieved.

Article 3(d). Promoting equality in employment under the control of a public authority. The Committee notes that in its most recent concluding observations, the United Nations Committee on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination (CERD) drew the Government’s attention to the under-representation of minorities in public services and to the need to assess the reasons for this phenomenon and address it effectively (CERD/C/FJI/CO/18-20, 31 August 2012, paragraph 12). While noting the Government’s general statement that all ministries are implementing the Equal Employment Opportunity Policy, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on concrete measures taken to ensure equality of opportunity and treatment of men and women from all ethnic groups in employment in the public service. Please also provide up-to-date statistics on the representation of men and women, from all ethnic groups, in the different categories, levels and grades in the public service.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Finland

Workers with Family Responsibilities Convention, 1981 (No. 156)
(ratification: 1983)

The Committee notes the observations of the Central Organisation of Finnish Trade Unions (SAK), the Confederation of Unions for Professional and Managerial Staff in Finland (AKAVA), the Finnish Confederation of Professionals (STTK) and the Confederation of Finnish Industries (EK), integrated into the Government’s report. With regard to EK’s comments, whereby the Convention does not require equal distribution of family leave between men and women nor flexible working time solutions or work arrangements, the Committee emphasizes that the Convention aims to create effective equality of opportunity and treatment for men and women workers with family responsibilities and that the Committee examines the implementation of the provisions of the Convention both in law and in practice. In doing so, the Committee assesses to which extent the measures adopted are efficient in guaranteeing that persons with family responsibilities who are engaged or wish to engage in employment are able to exercise their right to do so without being subject to discrimination and, to the extent possible, without conflict between their employment and family responsibilities.

Legislative developments. Prohibition of discrimination on the basis of family responsibilities. The Committee recalls its latest comment under the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111), in which it noted the entry into force of a new Non-Discrimination Act (1325/2014) on 1 January 2015. The Committee notes with interest that, in this new Act, the scope of the prohibition of discrimination has been expanded and now includes, inter alia, the ground of “family status” (section 8(1)). The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the application of section 8(1) of the Non-Discrimination Act (1325/2014) in practice, including any judicial decision taken or any discrimination case filed with the Ombudsperson.

Articles 3 and 4(b) of the Convention. National policy and leave entitlements. The Committee notes the Government’s indication that legislative amendments concerning paternity leave, which entered into force on 21 December 2012, extended the length of such leave to nine weeks and the period during which the leave can be taken to two years after childbirth or placement in the case of adoption. The Government further indicates that, according to the National Social Insurance Institution, there was an increase of 11 per cent in the number of fathers receiving the parental allowance between 2014 and 2015 but that mothers are still the primary users of parental leave despite an increase in the use of the overall permitted parental leave by fathers which increased from 8.3 to 9.7 per cent in 2015 (it was 7.1 per cent in 2010). It adds that, from 13 December 2013, a new flexible care allowance can be paid to parents who participate in the care of a child under 3 years of age and work no more than 30 hours per week on average. As of 18 March 2016, mothers no longer earn leave days for the whole period of parental leave but only for six months during this period. The Government explains that this is to promote a better distribution of parental leave between mothers and fathers by encouraging fathers to take part of the parental leave more frequently, allowing the mothers to go back to work earlier. In their comments, SAK, AKAVA and STTK regret, however, that the Government has decreased the income-based parental allowance and limited the accrual of annual leave during parental leave. They consider that these and other measures will, in practice, affect the status of women in the labour market as women still take 90 per cent of all the family leave allowance. The Committee notes that, in the country report the Government produced in May 2014 on the implementation of the Beijing Platform for Action (1995) and the Outcome of the twenty-third special session of the United Nations General Assembly (2000), it indicated that, since January 2014, care subsidy was paid also to parents working part time with the objective to encourage women with small children to return to work earlier and to urge both parents to share the child care. The Government indicated that one of the most difficult issues was to enhance the equal sharing of family leave between mothers and fathers. In this regard, the Committee notes that, in its final observations, the United Nations Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW) regretted that the percentage of men who take equal sharing of domestic and family tasks between women and men, including by developing incentives to encourage more men to avail themselves of parental leave” (CEDAW/C/FIN/CO/7, 10 March 2014, paragraphs 26 and 27(d)). The Committee further notes that the Government Action Plan for Gender Equality 2016–19 sets long-term and mid-term objectives and envisages a set of measures to be taken such as: (i) a lump-sum of €2,500 for employers to compensate costs incurred due to family leave; (ii) introducing more flexibility in the starting date of the maternity allowance period; (iii) fostering family-friendly practices in the workplace; and (iv) improving the possibilities for workers to take care of their relatives. The Committee asks the Government to continue to provide information on any legislative amendments or other measures with regard to the parental leave system (including on the implementation of the Government Action Plan for Gender Equality 2016-19) as well as statistical information relating to the use of parental leave by men and women. To ensure improved application of the Convention, the Committee requests the Government to provide more detailed information on the impact of the measures taken, in particular the decrease in the income-based parental allowance and limitation the accrual of annual leave during parental leave to which SAK, AKAVA and STTK refer, and their effect on the situation of women and the frequency of leave taken by men.

Articles 7 and 8. Return to work, following family leave and protection from dismissal. In reply to the Committee’s request to provide information on the practical application and effects of the provisions concerned with the ability of workers returning from family leave to remain integrated in the labour force, the Government cites the Employment Contracts Act (55/2001), Chapter 4, section 9, according to which, at the end of a family leave, employees are entitled to return to their former duties. If this is not possible, employees shall be offered equivalent work in accordance with their employment contract; and if this is not possible either, other work in accordance with their employment contract. The Government adds that if it is not possible to offer an employee who returns from family leave any work that corresponds to the employment contract, the general provisions of the Act on terminating employment contracts and lay-offs, as well as the provisions on the related training and relocation obligations, are utilized when assessing the employer’s right to terminate or lay off the employee. It also refers to Chapter 7, section 9, of the Act which, not only, expressly prohibits termination of an employment contract on the ground of pregnancy or use of family leave but also reverses the burden of proof which is placed on the employer in case of dismissal. The Committee further notes that, in the previously mentioned country report of May 2014, the Government indicated that, according to studies, women faced discrimination at the workplace on grounds of pregnancy and family responsibilities. In this regard, the Committee recalls that, in its final observations, the CEDAW reiterated its concern regarding the illegal dismissal of women owing to pregnancy, childbirth and maternity leave and recommended that the Government "amend legislation to specifically prohibit employers from not renewing fixed-term employment contracts based on family leave and from limiting their duration on that basis” (CEDAW/C/FIN/CO/7, 10 March 2014, paragraphs 26 and 27(c)). The Committee notes the information provided by the Government concerning court decisions relevant to the principles covered in the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on any measures taken: (i) to examine the relevance of implementing awareness-raising measures to engender broader understanding by employers, workers and the general public, of the problems encountered by male and female workers with family responsibilities; and (ii) to prohibit the non-renewal or limitation of the duration of fixed-term contracts based on the mere basis of family responsibilities of the worker. It asks the Government to continue providing information on any relevant court decisions.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

France

Workers with Family Responsibilities Convention, 1981 (No. 156)

(ratification: 1989)

Article 4 of the Convention. Leave entitlements. The Committee notes with interest that Act No. 2015-1776 of 28 December 2015 on adapting society to the ageing population has replaced the right to “family support leave” with “caregiver leave”, as direct kinship is no longer required. The Committee notes that Act No. 2014-873 of 4 August 2014 on real gender equality created the shared childcare benefit (PreParE) to replace the free choice of activity supplement (CLCA) as from 1 July 2015, with a view to encouraging fathers’ involvement and making the impact of childcare on working life less disproportionate between mothers and fathers. The Committee nevertheless notes that, according to the 2017 report of the National Observatory for Early Childhood, at the end of 2016, only 4.4 per cent of recipients of the activity supplement were fathers and that the shared childcare benefit was not in fact shared, since the decrease in the payments linked to this benefit is particularly significant after 24 months, at the time when the benefit is to be shared between the mother and father.

Moreover, the Committee notes with interest that the abovementioned Act of 4 August 2014 has extended protection against dismissal following the birth of a child – from which only mothers previously benefited – to fathers, and that Act No. 2016-1088 of 8 August 2016 has extended this period of protection from four to ten weeks. The Committee notes the study that was published in March 2016 by the Directorate of Research, Studies, Evaluation and Statistics (Drees), according to which 68 per cent of fathers with at least one child under 3 years of age who were eligible for maternity leave took such leave. Lastly, it notes the Government’s indication that the Labour Code establishes several types of leave to enable employees — both men and women — to bear their family responsibilities while remaining in employment. Leave is available to employees: to undergo medical examinations during pregnancy and after childbirth; when a woman gives birth to a child; when a man fathers a child; when adopting a child; to take care of a child; to look after a child who is ill; to look after a child who is seriously ill, has a disability or has been the victim of an accident; for family events (weddings, deaths, births); to take care of a close relative suffering from a serious pathology or condition; and to take care of a close relation with a disability or loss of autonomy of a particularly serious nature. Acts Nos 2014-459 of 9 May 2014, 2014-873 of 4 August 2014 and 2016-41 of 26 January 2016 enable, respectively, employees to donate days of rest to a colleague whose child is seriously ill; the leave authorization granted to women for pregnancy check-ups to be extended to their spouse, civil-union partner or live-in partner; and a new leave authorization for employees who use medically-assisted procreation. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on the number of men and women benefiting from the daily parental presence allowance and caregiver leave and on the number of employed fathers who have applied for and taken paternity leave (public and private sector employees and self-employed workers). The Government is requested to provide information on any evaluations of the payment of the new shared childcare benefit and its impact on families, as well as on any new measures to take into account the needs of workers with family responsibilities.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

French Polynesia

Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111)

The Committee notes that the Government’s report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments initially made in 2016.

Article 1 of the Convention. Protection against discrimination. Private sector. Legislative developments. The Committee notes that territorial Act No. 2013-6 expands the list of prohibited grounds of discrimination with the addition of the following new grounds: customs, sexual orientation or identity, age, genetic characteristics, actual or supposed membership or non-membership of a nation or race, activities in mutual benefit associations, physical appearance, family name, state of health or disability (section Lp. 1121-1 of the Labour Code of French Polynesia). The Committee notes that the prohibited grounds of discrimination covered by section Lp. 1121-1 are the same as those established by section L. 1132-1 of the Labour Code applicable in metropolitan France, with the exception of “place of residence” and “particular vulnerability resulting from the economic situation [of the person], which is apparent to or known by the person committing the discrimination”, which are grounds of discrimination that were introduced into the Labour Code in February 2014 and June 2016, respectively. The Committee notes that the ground of “colour” referred to in Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention is covered by the ground of “physical appearance” and observes that the Government confirms that the term “origin” referred to in section Lp. 1121-1 of the Labour Code of French Polynesia refers to “national extraction” within the meaning of the Convention. The Committee notes, however, that despite the recent legislative progress, the ground of “social origin”, mentioned in Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention has not been included among the grounds of discrimination prohibited by section Lp. 1121-1 of the Labour Code of French Polynesia. Moreover, the Committee notes that section Lp. 1121-2 has inserted in the Labour Code of French Polynesia a non-exhaustive list of aspects of employment, namely dismissal, remuneration, incentives or distribution of shares, training, reclassification, assignment, qualifications, classification, promotion, transfer and contract renewal, and access to internship or a training course in an enterprise. The Committee also notes that the section now refers explicitly to direct and indirect discriminatory measures. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on any measures taken with a view to inserting the ground of “social origin” in the list of the grounds of discrimination prohibited by the Labour Code of French Polynesia (section Lp. 1121-1) so as to cover all the grounds of discrimination enumerated in Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention. The Committee also requests the Government to indicate the measures taken to ensure that workers are protected in practice against discrimination based on this ground. In order to extend workers’ protection against discrimination and to align it to the anti-discrimination provisions applicable in metropolitan France, the Committee invites the Government to examine the possibility of adding “place of residence” and “particular vulnerability resulting from the economic situation [of the person], which is apparent to or known by the person committing the discrimination” to the list of grounds of discrimination which are prohibited by the Labour Code of French Polynesia, and requests it to provide information on any measures taken in this respect.

Public sector. The Committee notes that territorial Act No. 2013-17 of 10 May 2013 expands the list of prohibited grounds of discrimination in respect of public service to include the following grounds: origin, sexual orientation or identity, age, family name, physical appearance, and actual or supposed membership or non-membership of a race (section 5). The Committee notes that the prohibited grounds of discrimination covered by section 5 are the same as those covered by section 6 of Act No. 83-634 of 13 July 1983 applicable in metropolitan France issuing the rights and obligations of officials, with the exception of “family situation”. The Committee notes however that despite the legislative progress made, the ground of “social origin” mentioned in Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention, is not included among the grounds of discrimination prohibited by section 5 of the General Public Service Regulations of French Polynesia. The Committee further notes that section 5 henceforth explicitly prohibits any direct or indirect distinctions between civil servants. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on any measures taken with a view to inserting “social origin” in the list of grounds of discrimination prohibited by section 5 of the General Public Service Regulations of French Polynesia so as to cover all the grounds of discrimination enumerated in Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention. The Committee also requests the Government to indicate the measures taken to ensure that public servants are protected in practice against discrimination on the basis of social origin. The Committee invites the Government to examine the possibility of adding “family situation” to the list of grounds of discrimination prohibited by this section and requests it to provide information on any measures taken in this respect. It further requests the Government to provide information on the reasons why, in French Polynesia, the list of grounds of discrimination prohibited in the public service (section 5 of the General Regulations) is more limited than the list applicable in the private sector (section Lp. 1221-1 of the Labour Code of French Polynesia) and invites it to harmonize the protection of public officials and private sector workers against discrimination in employment and occupation.

Sexual harassment and moral harassment. Public and private sectors. The Committee notes the introduction of provisions concerning sexual harassment and moral harassment into both the Labour Code of French Polynesia (Lp. 1141-1 to 1141-12) and the General Public Service Regulations of French Polynesia. These provisions define and prohibit both quid pro quo and hostile working environment sexual harassment, and provide for the protection of victims and witnesses against any form of reprisal (sanctions, dismissal, direct or indirect discriminatory measures) and also for disciplinary sanctions against persons who commit harassment. The provisions also require the employer to take measures to prevent and address sexual or psychological harassment, including the establishment of a procedure, within the internal regulations, for reporting harassment and awareness-raising actions. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the application in practice of the provisions concerning sexual harassment and moral harassment, especially with regard to the role of the inspection services in addressing sexual or moral harassment, and also on any procedure initiated on the basis of these provisions and its results.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

New Caledonia

Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100)

The Committee recalls that it asked the Government to reply in full to its comments. It notes with regret that the Government’s brief report only contains general information on equal remuneration and that it is identical to the report received in 2017, except for the information supplied concerning a conference on gender equality at work held in New Caledonia in April 2018.

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Wage gap. The Committee notes that, according to the Government’s report, the average wage was 3.2 per cent higher for men than for women in 2015. The report also indicates that the higher the level of post, the greater the wage gap, with male managerial staff being paid on average 17.8 per cent more than female managerial staff. The Committee also notes that, according to the report on women’s employment published by the Mission for Women in 2016, women in the public sector are paid on average 15 per cent less than men. The Committee requests the Government to continue providing recent data on remuneration for men and women and on the gender wage gap in the public and private sectors, if possible according to sector of activity and the hierarchical level of the posts held.

Article 2. Equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value. Measures to combat the gender wage gap. The Committee observes that the Government’s report merely refers once again to the regulatory framework applicable to equal remuneration for men and women (section Lp. 141 of the Labour Code of New Caledonia) and that the Government once again indicates that it has not taken any measures regarding equal remuneration for work of equal value. The Committee also recalls that, in its direct request concerning the application of the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111), it underlined the continuing precariousness of the situation of women and its negative impact on their education, training and occupational integration, the lack of sufficient action for indigenous women and the lack of information, education and communication activities to promote a change in attitudes towards women and girls. Recalling that proactive efforts must be made to tackle gender wage gaps to achieve results in this area, the Committee requests the Government to take specific measures to promote equal remuneration for work of equal value, in the areas of vocational guidance and training to combat occupational sex segregation, through awareness raising and training to combat social stereotypes regarding “male” and “female” jobs and by establishing schemes to enable both women and men to achieve a better balance between family life and work.

Article 4. Cooperation with workers’ and employers’ organizations. The Committee notes that section Lp. 333-2(2°) of the Labour Code provides that “wage negotiations shall provide the opportunity for the parties to examine at the branch level at least once a year … changes to average wages by professional category and by sex, if applicable by comparison with hierarchical minimum wages”. The Committee requests the Government to indicate whether and how the issue of equal remuneration for men and women is addressed during wage negotiations and to clarify more generally in what manner it cooperates with the social partners to give effect to the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value established by the Convention.

Awareness-raising measures with regard to the principle of the Convention. The Committee welcomes the holding of a conference on gender equality at work in the South Province in April 2018, which, inter alia, addressed the subject of pay equality with particular reference to the Convention. In order to combat more effectively the underlying causes of pay inequalities, such as prejudicial and stereotypical attitudes towards women or occupational segregation, and to ensure a better application of the principle of the Convention in practice, the Committee strongly encourages the Government to continue its awareness-raising activities by focusing more on equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value and ensuring that such activities are reproduced for workers and employers and their respective organizations, labour law enforcement officials and the general public.

Enforcement. Labour inspection. The Committee notes that the Government’s report indicates the penalties applicable for non-observance of the principle of “equal wages for equal work” but that it does not contain information on the work actually done by labour inspectors in this area. The Committee draws the Government’s attention to the fact that it is a question of ensuring observance of the principle of “equal remuneration for work of equal value” as established by the Convention and not only for “equal work”. The Committee once again requests the Government to take the necessary steps to enable labour inspectors to perform their duties in terms of enforcing the labour legislation as it relates to equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value (section Lp. 141-1 in conjunction with section Lp. 711-1 of the Labour Code of New Caledonia), and to provide information on measures taken in this respect, particularly as regards training for inspectors with regard to equal remuneration issues and the planning of inspection activities according to thematic areas (gender equality, pay equality).

Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111)

Article 1(1)(a) and (3) of the Convention. Prohibited grounds of discrimination and scope of application. Legislation. The Committee recalls that, in its previous comments, it highlighted that the prohibition of discrimination provided for in section Lp. 112-1 of the Labour Code of New Caledonia (CTNC) did not cover colour or social origin and requested clarifications regarding the scope of that section. The Committee notes the Government’s confirmation in its report that the prohibition of discrimination covers all stages of employment, including sanctions and dismissal. Regarding the grounds of discrimination that are not covered, the Government indicates that the terms “race” and “origin”, which are explicitly set out in section Lp. 112-1 of the CTNC, may be interpreted broadly by the Nouméa Labour Tribunal to protect workers against discrimination linked to their “colour” or “social origin”. The Government adds that workers who are victims of discrimination on these grounds can assert their rights under section L. 225-1 of the Penal Code, which covers “physical appearance” and “the particular vulnerability arising out of the economic situation of the worker, apparent or known to the perpetrator of the discrimination”, and which is applicable in New Caledonia. In this regard, the Committee would like to draw the Government’s attention to the fact that criminal proceedings are not necessarily suitable to effectively combat and end discrimination in employment and occupation, particularly taking into account the sensitive nature of these issues and the characteristics of the criminal proceedings, for example in relation to the burden of proof and delays. The Committee also recalls that, when legal provisions are adopted to give effect to the principle of the Convention, they must cover as a minimum all the grounds of discrimination set out in Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention. In order to enable workers to avail themselves of their right to non-discrimination on the basis at least of the grounds enumerated by Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention in the fields of employment and occupation and to avoid any legal uncertainty based on possible interpretations of legal provisions by courts, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to include “colour” and “social origin” in the list of prohibited grounds of discrimination set out in section Lp. 112-1 of the Labour Code of New Caledonia. In the absence of provisions to this effect in the labour legislation, the Committee also requests the Government to provide information on any proceedings undertaken on the basis of section L.225-1 of the Penal Code in the area of employment and occupation.

Article 1(1)(b). Additional grounds of discrimination. Legislative developments. The Committee notes with interest the amendment to section Lp. 112-1 of the CTNC inserting the prohibition of any discrimination on the grounds of “the exercise of a customary responsibility”, which followed the adoption of Territorial Act No. 2018-3 of 28 May 2018 establishing leave for customary responsibilities. However, the Committee recalls that, in its previous comments, it emphasized that the list of prohibited grounds of discrimination in metropolitan France under the Labour Code (section L. 1132-1) is more extensive than that provided for in the CTNC (section Lp. 112-1) and requested the Government to indicate the reasons for such a difference. The Committee notes the Government’s indication that the labour legislation in New Caledonia, which is under the exclusive jurisdiction of this overseas territory, is developed taking into account the demands of the social partners, but that nothing prevents New Caledonia from adding to the list of prohibited grounds of discrimination set out in section Lp. 112-1 the other grounds covered by the Labour Code applicable in metropolitan France. Noting that an evaluation report on the application of Territorial Act No. 2018-3 of 28 May 2018 establishing leave for customary responsibilities will be issued in a year, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the findings of the report, particularly regarding any discrimination or obstacle to employment that workers could have faced as a result of exercising a customary responsibility. In light of the above, the Committee also requests the Government, in cooperation with the workers’ and employers’ organizations, to examine the possibility of adding to the list of grounds of discrimination prohibited in New Caledonia under the CTNC, in order to align it with the list of prohibited grounds of discrimination in metropolitan France under the Labour Code and thus to provide the same protection to all workers against discrimination in employment and occupation.

Article 2. Non-discrimination and equality of opportunity and treatment for men and women. The Committee recalls the concerns it expressed in its previous comments about the inequalities and discrimination that women suffer, particularly in employment and occupation. In that regard, the Committee notes that, according to a study entitled “The Labour Force in New Caledonia: 2017 Results”, women’s labour market participation is 12 points lower than that of men and, most importantly, half of women who wish to work do not enter the labour market, especially at the beginning of their family life. This data also shows that, while 57 per cent of Kanak women are active in the labour market (in comparison with 60.8 per cent of all women), their unemployment rate remains high at 21.3 per cent, compared with 13.4 per cent for all women. The Committee notes the Government’s indication that, in view of the persistent de facto inequalities between men and women in the world of work, a reform bill on occupational equality was developed by the Labour and Employment Directorate, in collaboration with the Observatory for Women’s Issues, and analysis was conducted on the measures to be taken to combat gender stereotypes and improve women’s access to the various occupations, particularly in rural areas. Furthermore, the Committee welcomes the organization by the Labour and Employment Directorate, in collaboration with the Observatory for Women’s Issues, of a conference on occupational gender equality, in April 2018, which addressed the issues of equality and the prohibition of discrimination against women, sexual and moral harassment, wage equality and protection for parents (workers with family responsibilities), in the South Province. The Government also indicates that the implementation is ongoing in the North Province of a multi-year plan (2014–19) comprising seven main themes, including action to combat all forms of discrimination against women. Noting that this information appears to demonstrate a willingness to promote equality of opportunity between men and women, the Committee trusts that the analysis undertaken on this matter and the reform bill on occupational equality will quickly lead to specific measures and requests the Government to step up its efforts to raise the awareness of workers, employers and their organizations regarding the issues of equality and non-discrimination in employment and occupation, particularly in the framework of the multi-year plan. The Committee once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures, particularly in rural areas, to: (i) encourage women and girls to undertake training that offers genuine and diverse employment opportunities, particularly in the sectors and occupations traditionally occupied by men; (ii) ensure that women are more aware of their rights and the mechanisms in place to promote access to employment and the different occupations, at all levels of responsibility; (iii) combat gender stereotypes with regard to women’s aspirations, preferences and vocational skills, particularly through awareness-raising and information initiatives; and (iv) implement and develop mechanisms to allow men and women workers to better reconcile work and family responsibilities. The Government is requested to provide information on the measures taken in this regard and on the activities of the Mission for Women’s Issues in the South Province and the Observatory for Women’s Issues in the area of employment, and to continue to provide statistical data, disaggregated by sex, on employment.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Gambia

The Committee notes with deep concern that the Government’s report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments initially made in 2011.

Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention. Discrimination in employment and occupation. Legislation. The Committee previously pointed out that the provisions of the Constitution regarding discrimination did not include any reference to the prohibition of direct and indirect discrimination in employment and occupation and only concerned discriminatory treatment by public officials (section 33(3)). It also noted that the Labour Act 2007 neither defines nor prohibits discrimination in employment and occupation on the basis of any of the grounds enumerated in the Convention, except in the case of dismissal and disciplinary action (section 83(2)). The Committee notes that the Government provides no response to its request regarding the need to amend the legislation. The Committee recalls once again that, although general constitutional provisions regarding non-discrimination are important, they are generally not sufficient to address specific cases of discrimination in employment and occupation, and comprehensive anti-discrimination legislation is generally needed to ensure the effective application of the Convention, based on at least all the grounds of discrimination listed in Article 1(1)(a) and in all areas of employment and occupation. The Committee asks the Government to take steps in order to include legislative protection against direct and indirect discrimination at all stages of employment and occupation based on, as a minimum, all of the grounds enumerated in the Convention, namely, race, colour, sex, religion, political opinion, national extraction and social origin. The Committee also asks the Government to include in legislation provisions establishing dissuasive sanctions and appropriate remedies in cases of discrimination. Please provide specific information on progress made in this regard.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee expects that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100) (ratification: 1993)

Follow-up to the conclusions of the Committee on the Application of Standards (International Labour Conference, 107th Session, May–June 2018)

The Committee notes the discussion at the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards at its 107th Session (June 2018) of the International Labour Conference and the conclusions adopted which called upon the Government to:

(i) ensure that national legislation, in particular the Labour Code (2006), the Law on Gender Equality (2010), the Law on Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination (2014) and/or the Law on the Public Service (2015), expressly commits to the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value in consultation with the social partners;

(ii) implement effective enforcement and detection mechanisms to ensure that the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value is applied in practice;

(iii) take steps to raise awareness among workers, employers and their organizations of the laws and procedures available in order to allow them to avail themselves of their rights;

(iv) continue to provide information on decisions handed down by the judiciary, and cases handled by the Office of the Public Defender;

(v) continue to provide gender-disaggregated data on labour market participation and remuneration;

(vi) provide the Committee of Experts with information related to the 2018–20 Georgian National Action Plan on Gender Equality adopted in May 2018 and its potential impact on the principle of equal remuneration for work of equal value in law and practice; and

(vii) avail itself of ILO technical assistance in implementing these recommendations.

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Legislation. For a number of years, the Committee has been raising concerns regarding the absence of legislation giving full expression to the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value. In particular, the Committee recalls that section 2(3) of the Labour Code (2006), only contains a general prohibition of discrimination in labour relations; and that the Law on Gender Equality (2010) prohibits discrimination (section 6) and provides that “equality in evaluating the quality of work performed by women and men shall be maintained without discrimination” (section 4(2)(i)). Further, the Committee noted that the Law on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination, adopted on 2 May 2014, while including a general prohibition of discrimination based on sex, does not refer to the principle of equal remuneration for work of equal value; and that section 57(1) of the Law on the Public Service provides that the system of remuneration for public officials is based on the “principles of transparency and fairness, which means the implementation of equal pay for equal work”, which is narrower than the principle of the Convention.

The Committee welcomes the Government’s indication, in its report, that the Ministry of Labour, Health and Social Affairs is working, in cooperation with the social partners, on amending the relevant labour legislation to implement the EU Directive 2006/54/EC of 5 July 2006, which provides that, for the same work or for work of equal value, direct and indirect discrimination on grounds of sex with regard to all aspects and conditions of remuneration must be eliminated. The Committee also notes the Government’s indication that the second objective of the Gender Equality Council Action Plan 2018–20 is to eliminate legislative gaps and improve the legislative framework on gender equality. Recalling that the Convention has been ratified since 1993, the Committee trusts that the Government will endeavour to ensure, in cooperation with the social partners and the Council for Gender Equality, that the labour legislation is amended to give full legislative expression to the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value, with a view to ensuring the full and effective implementation of the Convention without delay. It also urges the Government to take the necessary steps to amend section 57(1) of the Law on the Public Service (2015) to capture the concept of “work of equal value” so as to ensure that public officials covered by the Law are entitled not only to equal remuneration for equal work, but also for work that is entirely different but nonetheless of equal value. The Government is requested to provide information on the progress achieved in this regard and a copy of the new relevant provisions once adopted.

Article 2. Measures to address the gender pay gap and promote equal remuneration. Previously the Committee had noted, based on statistics provided by the Government, that a substantial gender gap in average monthly nominal wages existed in every sector of the labour market (36.9 per cent in 2014), including in female-dominated sectors such as education and health care, and that inequality existed with respect to the average salary distribution among men and women even with similar levels of education. With regard to measures taken to address the gender pay gap, the Committee noted the creation of an Inter-Ministerial Commission on Gender Equality and Women’s Empowerment in September 2015. While taking note of all this information, the Committee urged the Government to take measures to identify and address the underlying causes of inequalities in remuneration and to provide information on any awareness-raising activities to promote equal remuneration for work of equal value.
The Committee notes the updated data provided by the Government on the average monthly earnings of men and women workers disaggregated by sex and by economic activity from 2010 to the first quarter of 2018. From this information, the Committee notes that the gender pay gap remains high in nearly all sectors of activity. In particular it notes that in 2017, in the financial intermediation and the health and social work sectors, men earned on average significantly more than women (in financial intermediation, men earned 2,943 Georgian lari (GEL) while women earned GEL1,381; in health and social work, men earned on average GEL1,247 while women earned GEL866). The Committee notes the fifth objective of the Gender Equality Council Action Plan 2018–20 the aim of which is to raise awareness on gender equality through, among others, the organization of thematic public meetings in the different regions of the country, support awareness-raising activities on women’s political participation, and strengthen cooperation and coordination with international networks and organizations working on gender equality and women’s rights. In this regard, the Committee notes that the Government further indicates that in 2017, a working group on labour rights and gender equality was established at the Council for Gender Equality, and presented a list of recommendations to improve women’s rights in the workplace, which included recommendations concerning equal pay. In addition, the Committee notes the Government’s indication that the Council for Gender Equality is due to approve a State Concept on Gender Equality, a major guiding policy document on gender equality which will employ terms such as “equal pay for work of equal value”.

Finally, the Committee notes the Government’s statement that the gender pay gap is not primarily conditioned by the law or regulations but by the traditional norms and attitudes towards women, obliging them to combine their household chores and career development. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the specific measures taken or envisaged in the framework of the State Concept on Gender Equality and the Gender Equality Council Action Plan 2018–20 directly aimed at reducing the gender pay gap. Such measures, may include, for example, undertaking sensitization programmes and awareness-raising activities to overcome traditional stereotypes regarding the role of women in society or adopting measures on shared parental leave, and affordable and available childcare services. The Committee also encourages the Government to continue its efforts in identifying and addressing the underlying causes of inequalities in remuneration, such as gender discrimination, gender stereotypes, and occupational segregation and to promote women’s access to a wider range of job opportunities at all levels, including top management positions and higher paying jobs. The Committee further requests the Government to provide detailed information on the awareness-raising activities undertaken specifically in the framework of the Gender Equality Council Action Plan 2018–20 to promote equal remuneration for work of equal value, including with respect to bonuses, premiums and other additional wage allowances. Finally, the Government is requested to continue to provide statistical data on men’s and women’s monthly and hourly wages and additional allowances, according to economic sector, as well as data on the number of men and women employed in these sectors.

Enforcement. The Committee previously noted with concern the Government’s indication that further to the abolition of the Labour Inspection Service in 2006, there was no longer a labour supervisory body. In its reply, the Government indicated that a National Programme for Monitoring Labour Conditions was approved by Ordinance No. 38 of 5 February 2015, and that by Ordinance No. 81 of 2 March 2015, a Department of Inspection of Labour Conditions was set up within the Ministry of Labour, Health and Social Affairs. The Committee further noted that the Office of the Public Defender had indicated that the Labour Code should be amended to address the non-binding nature of recommendations made by the inspection services. Therefore, the Committee once again stressed the need to put in place adequate and effective enforcement mechanisms to ensure that the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value is applied in practice, and to allow workers to avail themselves of their rights.

The Committee notes that the Conference Committee expressed its concern over the abolition of the Labour Inspection Service and the absence of an equivalent replacement to ensure the enforcement of the rights and principles protected by the Convention. It notes the Government’s indication in its report that it is committed to re-establishing a fully-fledged labour inspectorate by 2019. The Government further states that the new labour inspectorate will have the authority to conduct unannounced inspections in all enterprises, enforce all labour laws and levy sanctions on violators that are sufficiently dissuasive to deter future violations. The Committee also notes the Government’s information according to which the courts have reported no cases regarding equal pay between men and women. In this regard, the Committee recalls that when no cases or complaints are being lodged it is likely to indicate a lack of an appropriate legal framework, lack of awareness of rights, lack of confidence in, or absence of practical access to procedures, or fear of reprisals (see 2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, paragraph 870). The Committee therefore requests once again the Government to enhance the capacity of the competent authorities, including judges, labour inspectors and other public officials, to identify and address cases of pay inequalities between men and women for work of equal value, and also to examine whether the applicable substantive and procedural provisions, in practice, allow claims to be brought successfully. Further, while taking due note of the Government’s indication that it intends to reinforce the powers of the labour inspectorate, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on how it ensures the effective enforcement of the principle of the Convention in practice, for example by including information on any activities of the Department of Inspection of Labour Conditions, including training of labour inspectors related to the principle enshrined in the Convention and on any violations detected. The Government is also requested to continue to provide any information on decisions handed down by the courts or other competent bodies with regard to this issue, as well as any cases regarding unequal remuneration handled by the Office of the Public Defender, which is mandated to examine complaints of sex discrimination and make recommendations.
The Committee reminds the Government that it can avail itself of ILO technical assistance to these recommendations.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Germany

The Committee notes the observations of the German Confederation of Trade Unions (DGB) of 5 December 2016.

Article 2 of the Convention. Legislation. Wage transparency. The Committee notes with interest the adoption of the Transparency in Wage Structures Act on 30 June 2017, which introduces an individual entitlement for employees in establishments with more than 200 employees to obtain information on the median monthly gross salary of at least six employees of the other gender who perform the same work or work of equal value, as well as on the criteria and procedure used for determining the remuneration. It notes that “equal work” is defined as identical or similar activity, and that “work of equal value” will be deemed to be conducted by women and men if taking into consideration the totality of the factors, such as the type of work, the training requirements and the working conditions, they can be seen as being in a comparable situation. In addition, according to the Act, private sector employers with more than 500 employees shall regularly report about the measures taken to promote gender equality and create equal pay for women and men in their company. Such employers are also encouraged, but not obliged, to use internal company evaluation procedures to assess their remuneration systems as well as the way in which they are applied, on a regular basis, to determine compliance with the equal pay requirements. The Committee also notes that the DGB criticizes the introduction of both thresholds and calls for compulsory internal company evaluation procedures. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the practical implementation of the Transparency in Wage Structures Act, including data on the level of compliance with the statutory reporting requirement on gender equality and equal pay at the company level, information on sanctions imposed in cases of non-compliance, information on employers’ exercise of their entitlements to information and any follow-up measures taken based on the disclosure of this information, as well as information on any actions taken to address gender wage gaps revealed, and the impact thereof. It also requests the Government to provide information on the number of undertakings of more than 200 employees and of more than 500 employees in the country and on the proportion of the workforce covered by these undertakings.

Assessment of the gender pay gap. The Committee notes the Government’s indication, in its report, that since 2002 the unadjusted wage differentials between men and women has remained virtually unchanged, as it was 21 per cent in 2017. It notes that the gender pay gap was 23 per cent in the private sector, against 9 per cent in the public sector, differentials being still substantially higher in the western part of Germany (23 per cent against 7 per cent in the new Länder). In 2016, pay differentials between women and men were still particularly wide in scientific and technical activities (31 per cent); financial and insurance services (28 per cent); as well as in information and communication (25 per cent) and manufacturing (25 per cent). The Committee notes the Government’s explanation that family-related career breaks have been identified as a particular cause of pay inequality and that, as a result, specific measures have been taken to better balance family responsibilities between men and women, including through the expansion of childcare services, the introduction of new family benefits (e.g. “Family Allowance Plus”), as well as through the implementation of several programmes, in collaboration with social partners, aimed at helping men and women return to work and promoting family-friendly working environments (e.g. “Back to Work Perspective” programme and “Success Factor Family” programme). The Government also indicates that, in order to fight against vertical segregation, a new Act on the Equal Participation of Women and Men in Leadership Positions in the Private and Public Sectors was adopted on 6 March 2015, with the objective of significantly increasing the proportion of women managers by introducing a mandatory 30 per cent gender quota, to be realized by 2016, for supervisory boards of more than 100 companies which are publicly listed and subject to parity co-determination (i.e. employees’ representation on their supervisory board). As of 2018, the proportion of women must be increased to 50 per cent. In addition, about 3,500 medium-sized companies are also required to set, by June 2017, their own targets for increasing the proportion of women on supervisory boards, executive boards and at the top management levels, which is considered by the DGB as being less successful. In accordance with the new legislation, the Federal Act on Gender Equality and the Federal Act on Appointment to Federal Bodies were revised to increase the proportion of women in leadership positions in the public sector. The Committee also notes that, in order to combat horizontal occupational segregation, the Government continued the Girls’ and Boys’ Days, introduced in 2011 to raise awareness on gender-stereotypical career choices, and that a new website was started in 2013 to give boys and girls opportunities to explore gender-related subjects (mytestingground 2.0). The Committee however notes with concern that, as highlighted by the DGB, the gender pay gap is still one of the highest in the European Union, being considerably higher than the average. It notes that, according to the most recent Structures of Earnings Survey, while three-quarters of the unadjusted gender pay gap can be attributed to structural differences, the remaining quarter cannot be explained by the characteristics relevant to the workplace. The Government states that when women have the same formal qualifications and otherwise identical qualities as men, the pay gap is still 7 per cent, which is a clear indication of latent discrimination against women in the labour market. The Committee further notes that the United Nations (UN) Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination Against Women (CEDAW), as well as the UN Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights (CESCR) expressed concern at the fact that the prevailing gender pay gap both in the public and private sectors continues to have a negative impact on women’s career development and pension benefits owing to insufficient effective implementation of legislation on the principle of equal pay for work of equal value, as well as at the persistence of horizontal and vertical occupational segregation, the concentration of women in the lower-paying service sectors and precarious employment owing to their traditional role as caregivers for children and the underrepresentation of women in managerial positions in companies (E/C.12/DEU/CO/6, 12 October 2018, paragraph 38 and CEDAW/C/DEU/CO/7-8, 9 March 2017, paragraph 35). While welcoming the measures implemented by the Government to combat vertical and horizontal occupational gender segregation of the labour market as a root cause of pay inequality between men and women, the Committee hopes that the Government will strengthen its efforts to eliminate the substantial gender pay gap which has remained at a high level for more than 15 years, in order to give its full application to the principle of equal remuneration between women and men for work of equal value, enshrined in its national legislation. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on the specific measures implemented to reduce the gender pay gap both in the public and private sectors, and to address its underlying causes, including by combating occupational gender segregation as well as stereotypes regarding the roles of women and men. It also requests the Government to continue to provide statistical information on the distribution of men and women in the different sectors of the economy and occupational levels and their respective levels of earnings.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee notes the observations of the German Trade Union Confederation (DGB) of 5 December 2016. Articles 2 and 3 of the Convention. Equality of opportunity and treatment irrespective of race, colour or national extraction. The Committee notes the Government’s statement, in its report, that the situation of persons with a migrant background, which represented 20 per cent of the total population in 2015, has improved slightly but still remains difficult. It notes that in 2015, the average unemployment rate was 14.6 per cent for foreigners, against 5.6 per cent for German nationals. The Committee notes the Government’s indication that several programmes focusing on persons with a migration background are being implemented in the framework of the National Action Plan on Integration (NAPI) which aims at: (i) increasing their employment opportunities, including in the public sector, as well as their qualifications and competencies; (ii) ensuring that advisers in employment agencies, job centres and others involved in the labour market have intercultural and migration-specific competencies; and (iii) securing a basis of skilled workers and improving their workplace integration by promoting diversity at the company level. Referring to its previous comments concerning the 113 projects sponsored between 2012 and 2014 under the “XENOS-Integration and Diversity” programme with the aim of improving access for youth with a migrant background to education and employment, the Committee notes the Government’s indication that alongside direct support for disadvantaged young people, this programme also contributed to create lasting changes in operational and administrative routine in human resources policy. It notes that the successful approaches from XENOS are being further developed as part of the European Social Fund (ESF) “Federal Integration Guidelines” Project for 2014–20. The Committee notes that while welcoming the efforts of the Government, the DGB considers that greater account should be taken of the gender perspective. It notes in this respect that the United Nations Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination Against Women (CEDAW) highlighted that migrant and minority women continue to be at risk of experiencing multiple forms of discrimination in access to education and employment (CEDAW/C/DEU/CO/7-8, 9 March 2017, paragraph 43). The Committee also notes that several UN bodies recently expressed concern about the high representation of minorities, including Sinti, Roma, people of African descent and other minorities victim of multiple discrimination, such as Muslims, in lower level schools and in schools in marginalized areas and recommended that the Government increase the level of educational attainment of children of ethnic minorities, in particular by preventing their marginalization, and comprehensively address de facto segregation of those minorities in education, taking into account its close relation to discrimination in the field of employment (CERD/C/DEU/CO/19-22, 30 June 2015, paragraph 13; A/HRC/36/60/Add.2, 15 August 2017, paragraphs 85 and 89; and A/HRC/WG.6/30/DEU/2, 12 March 2018, paragraphs 40, 55 and 56). Specific concerns were also expressed about the persistent discrimination faced by those minorities in gaining access to work opportunities or to management positions (CERD/C/DEU/CO/19-22, 30 June 2015, paragraphs 14 and 17; A/HRC/36/60/Add.2, 15 August 2017, paragraph 42; and A/HRC/WG.6/30/DEU/2, 12 March 2018, paragraph 42). The Committee notes that, in the framework of the Universal Periodic Review, the UN Working Group also recommended that the Government should strengthen its efforts to improve the integration of minorities in the labour market (A/HRC/39/9, 11 July 2018, paragraph 155). The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on the specific measures taken to prevent segregation and discrimination in education and employment of persons with a minority or migrant background including Sinti, Roma and people of African descent and to ensure them an improved access to education and employment opportunities, including through affirmative action measures, as well as the impact thereof. It further requests the Government to continue to provide information on the implementation of any programmes undertaken in that regard, including in the framework of the National Action Plan on Integration (NAPI) and the ESF “Federal Integration Guidelines” Project for 2014–20, as well as a copy of the results of any relevant studies and reports evaluating their impact.
Occupational segregation. The Committee notes the Government’s indication that several policies and programmes are still implemented to fight horizontal occupational segregation and that a panel of experts was established in 2014, under the overall management of the Government and with the involvement of the Federal Employment Agency, with a view to achieving a shared understanding of gender neutral choice of occupations and studies, identifying appropriate means of implementation and monitoring impact. It notes however that, in its 2017 concluding observations, the CEDAW recommended that the Government address discriminatory stereotypes and structural barriers that may deter girls from progressing beyond secondary education and enrolling in traditionally male-dominated fields of study, such as mathematics, information technology and science (CEDAW/C/DEU/CO/7-8, 9 March 2017, paragraph 34). Referring to its previous comments on the low representation of women in leadership positions in the private sector, the Committee takes note with interest of the adoption of the Act on the Equal Participation of Women and Men in Leadership Positions in the Public and Private Sectors on 6 March 2015, introducing a mandatory 30 per cent gender quota, to be realized by 2016, for supervisory boards of more than one hundred companies which are publicly listed and subject to parity co-determination (i.e. employees’ representation on their supervisory board). As of 2018, the proportion of women shall be increased to 30 per cent as far as bodies whose members are appointed by the federal Government are concerned. In addition, about 3,500 medium-sized companies are also required to set, by June 2017, their own targets for increasing the proportion of women on supervisory boards, executive boards and at the top management levels. In accordance with the new law, the Federal Act on Gender Equality and the Federal Act on Appointment to Federal Bodies were revised to increase the proportion of women in leadership positions in the public sector. The Government adds that support is provided to companies in this regard and thorough monitoring will be conducted every year by the Government to assess the impact of the Act. The Committee however notes that, according to the last European Commission country report on gender equality (2017, page 14), only 46 per cent of the companies fulfill the statutory gender quota for supervisory boards. It notes that the Federal Statistical Office considered, in 2017, that the proportion of women holding an executive position remained nearly unchanged in comparison with the previous two years, as it was 29.2 per cent which was still five percentage points lower than the European average. The Committee further notes that, in its 2018 concluding observations, the United Nations Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights (CESCR) expressed concern at the low representation of women in decision-making positions, particularly in the private sector, and at the ineffectiveness of the Act on the Equal Participation in this regard. It is concerned, in particular, that: (i) the statutory 30 per cent gender quota for supervisory boards, provided for in the Act, covers only 108 companies; (ii) a majority of those companies that are obliged to set targets for gender quotas under the Act have not done so; and (iii) sanctions for non-compliance are not effective (E/C.12/DEU/CO/6, 12 October 2018, paragraph 30). The Committee hopes that the Government will strengthen its efforts to effectively increase women’s representation in decision-making positions, including in supervisory boards, both in the public and private sectors, and through an effective implementation of the Act on the Equal Participation of Women and Men in Leadership Positions. It requests the Government to continue to provide information on any difficulties identified in the implementation of the Act and sanctions imposed, as well as on any other measures taken to enhance women’s representation in leadership positions. It further requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken to combat gender stereotypes regarding women’s career aspirations and capabilities which contribute to their under-representation in traditionally male-dominated fields of study, including as a result of the recommendations made in 2014 by the panel of experts on gender neutrality on the choice of education and employment, and the impact thereof.

The Committee notes with regret that, again, the Government’s report contains no information regarding a number of its previous comments. The Committee wishes to reiterate that without the necessary information, it is not in a position to assess the effective implementation of the Convention, including the progress achieved since its ratification. The Committee hopes that the Government’s next report will contain full information on the matters raised below.

Article 1(b) of the Convention. Equal remuneration for work of equal value. Legislation. The Committee recalls that since the adoption of the Labour Act in 2003, it has been raising concerns regarding sections 10(b) and 68 of the Act, which are set out in terms that are more restrictive than the principle of the Convention, providing for equal remuneration for “equal work”. The Committee notes with concern that the Government’s report merely repeats its previous indication that “equal pay for equal work without distinction of any kind” under sections 10(b) and 68 of the Labour Act is synonymous with the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value, but provides no details in support of this assertion and gave no indication that jobs of a completely different nature can be compared under the Act. The Committee emphasizes once more that the concept of “work of equal value” lies at the heart of the fundamental right of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value, and the promotion of equality. Due to historical attitudes and stereotypes regarding women’s aspirations, preferences and capabilities, certain jobs are held predominantly or exclusively by women (such as in caring professions) and others by men (such as in construction). Often “female jobs” are undervalued in comparison with work of equal value performed by men when determining wage rates. The concept of “work of equal value” is fundamental to tackling occupational sex segregation in the labour market, which exists in almost Every country, as it permits a broad scope of comparison, including, but going beyond equal remuneration for “equal” work, and also encompasses work that is of an entirely different nature, which is nevertheless of equal value (see 2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, paragraphs 672–679). Consequently, the Committee once again urges the Government to take the necessary measures to amend sections 10(b) and 68 of the Labour Act of 2003, in order to give full legislative expression to the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value set out in the Convention, and to provide information on any progress made in this regard.

Equal remuneration for work of equal value in the public service. The Committee recalls that a public service pay policy setting out a single spine salary structure was previously adopted and that all public service employees were to be brought under this structure by the end of 2012. The Committee also recalls that the evaluation had been made on the basis of four main job factors (knowledge and skill, responsibility, working conditions and effort) which had been subdivided into 13 subfactors. The Committee notes the documentation provided by the Government in its report, including a table entitled “Single spine salary structure”, a memorandum of understanding between the Fair Wages and Salaries Commission and the social partners, and a White Paper on the single spine pay policy. It notes however that the table “Single spine salary structure” provided does not contain information on the types of jobs that fall within each level of pay and thus does not allow the Committee to assess whether the method of evaluation of jobs used is effectively free from gender bias. The Committee therefore requests the Government to provide information on how it has classified jobs within the single spine salary structure, in order to allow it to assess the factors used to compare jobs and ensure that they are free from gender bias. Noting the absence of information provided in this regard, the Committee requests once more the Government to provide information on the progress made in covering all public service employees by the single spine salary structure, and how this has impacted on the relative pay of women and men in the public service. It also reiterates its request for specific information on the number of men and women at each level of the pay structure. Finally, the Committee reiterates its request to the Government to provide information on the practical application of this single spine salary structure, including on the issues dealt with by the Fair Wages and Salaries Commission and the steps taken by this Commission to ensure full application of the principle of the Convention in the public service.

Article 2(2)(c). Collective agreements. For a number of years, the Committee has been commenting on collective agreements that contained provisions discriminating against women, in particular concerning the allocation of certain fringe benefits. The Committee notes that, once more, the Government’s report does not contain any specific information in response to the Committee’s requests in this regard. Therefore, once again, the Committee urges the Government to take the necessary steps, in cooperation with employers’ and workers’ organizations, to ensure that provisions of collective agreements do not discriminate on the ground of sex. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on any measures taken or envisaged, in cooperation with employers’ and workers’ organizations, to promote the principle of equal remuneration between men and women for work of equal value, including objective job evaluation methods, through collective agreements. It also requests the Government to provide examples of collective agreements reflecting the principle enshrined in the Convention.

Article 3. Objective job evaluation in the private sector. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to take steps to promote objective job evaluation methods in the private sector to eliminate unequal pay between men and women. The Committee notes that the Government’s report is silent on this point. However, its notes from the sixth round of the Ghana Living Standards Survey, published in 2014, that the hourly earnings of men in the various occupational groups remain higher than those of women except for clerical support workers. The Committee recalls that the concept of “equal value” requires some method of measuring and comparing the relative value of different jobs. There needs to be an examination of the respective tasks involved, undertaken on the basis of entirely objective and non-discriminatory criteria to avoid the assessment being tainted by gender bias. While the Convention does not prescribe any specific method for such an examination, Article 3 presupposes the use of appropriate techniques for objective job evaluation, comparing factors such as skill, effort, responsibilities and working conditions (see 2012 General Survey, paragraphs 695–703). Consequently, the Committee once again requests the Government to take steps to promote objective job evaluation methods in the private sector to eliminate unequal pay, and to provide information on the progress made in this regard. Once more, it requests the Government to provide updated information on the gender pay gap in the private sector, including statistical information based on the results of the recent Ghana Living Standards Survey.

Article 4. Tripartite cooperation. Noting the lack of new information provided in this regard, the Committee once again recalls the important role of the employers’ and workers’ organizations in promoting the principle of the Convention. The Committee therefore requests the Government to provide specific information on the concrete steps and action undertaken to promote the principle of the Convention, and the results of such initiatives. The Committee also requests the Government to indicate whether equal remuneration between men and women has been discussed specifically within the National Tripartite Committee, and how the principle has been taken into consideration in the establishment of the minimum wage.

Enforcement. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that the National Labour Commission and the Fair Wages and Salaries Commission deal with issues pertaining to grievances of workers, particularly those regarding equal remuneration and that an Alternative Dispute Resolution Centre, pursuant to the Alternative Dispute Resolution Act of 2010, serves as an additional forum to deal with complaints regarding remuneration. The Committee notes the Government’s repeated indication that there have been no cases brought forward on the issue of equal remuneration between men and women workers for work of equal value. In this regard, the Committee recalls that, where no cases or complaints, or very few, are being lodged, this is likely to indicate a lack of an appropriate legal framework, lack of awareness of rights, lack of confidence in or absence of practical access to procedures, or fear of reprisals (see 2012 General Survey, paragraph 870). Therefore, the Committee requests the Government to take steps to raise awareness of the relevant legislation, to enhance the capacity of the competent authorities, including judges, labour inspectors and other public officials, to identify and address cases of discrimination and unequal pay, and also to examine whether the applicable substantive and procedural provisions, in practice, allow claims to be brought successfully. In addition, the Government is asked to provide information on any decisions by the courts, the National Labour Commission, the Fair Wages and Salaries Commission and the Alternative Dispute Resolution Centre or any other competent body, as well as on any violations identified by, or reported to, labour inspectors, relating to equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value.

(ratification: 1961)

The Committee notes with concern that the Government’s report once again contains no information in response to a number of its previous comments. The Committee wishes to reiterate that without the necessary information, it is not in a position to assess whether there is effective implementation of the Convention, including whether progress has been achieved since its ratification. The Committee hopes that the Government’s next report will contain full information on the matters raised below.

Article 1 of the Convention. Prohibited grounds of discrimination. Previously, the Committee recalled that the term “social status”, “politics” and “political status” set out as prohibited grounds of discrimination in sections 14 and 63 of the Labour Act of 2003 appear to be narrower than the terms “social origin” and “political opinion” enumerated in the Convention. It recalled that the prohibition of discrimination on the basis of political opinion, as contained in the Convention, should cover a worker’s activities to express or demonstrate political views and that this protection is not exclusively limited to an individual’s activities or position within a political party. Further, discrimination on the basis of social origin arises when an individual’s membership of a class, a socio-occupational category, or a caste determines his or her occupational future either by denying him or her access to certain jobs or activities or, conversely, by assigning him or her certain jobs. The Committee notes that, in its report, the Government merely repeats its previous statement that the Committee’s concerns have been communicated to the relevant agencies for appropriate action. Consequently, the Committee emphasizes once again that, where legal provisions are adopted to give effect to the principle of the Convention, they should include at least all the grounds of discrimination specified in Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention (see 2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, paragraph 853). The Committee urges the Government to take concrete steps to amend the Labour Act of 2003, so as to include at least all the grounds of discrimination specified in Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention, and to provide information on any progress made in this regard.

Article 1(1)(a). Discrimination based on sex. Sexual harassment. The Committee recalls its previous comments in which it noted that section 175 of the Labour Act, defining sexual harassment, appears to cover only quid pro quo harassment, and not hostile environment sexual harassment. The Committee notes the Government repeated indication that steps have been taken with a view to preventing and combating sexual harassment at work including workplace inspections, and education and training programmes for employers’ and workers’ organizations, but that no complaints or reports concerning sexual harassment at the workplace have been brought before the competent authorities under the Labour Act, including the National Labour Commission. The Committee again recalls that the absence of complaints regarding sexual harassment does not necessarily indicate that this form of sex discrimination does not exist; rather, it is likely to reflect the lack of an appropriate legal framework, the lack of awareness, understanding and recognition of this form of sex discrimination among government officials, and workers and employers and their organizations, as well as the lack of access to or the inadequacy of complaints mechanisms and means of redress, or fear of reprisals (see 2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, paragraph 790). The Committee urges the Government to expand the definition of sexual harassment to explicitly cover hostile environment sexual harassment. The Committee also urges the Government to take concrete steps – for example in the form of seminars, guidance, training, etc. – aimed at achieving better knowledge and understanding of the existence of sexual harassment and the means of preventing and addressing it, among labour inspectors, judges and other relevant public officials, as well as employers, workers and their organizations, and to provide information on the progress achieved.

Equality in employment without any distinction of race, colour, religion, or national extraction. The Committee notes with regret that the Government’s report is once again silent on the issue of discrimination on the grounds of race, colour, religion, and national extraction. It recalls that, while the relative importance of the problems relating to each of the grounds may differ for each country, when reviewing the situation and deciding on the measures to be taken, it is essential that attention be given to all the grounds in implementing the national policy (see 2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, paragraphs 848 and 849). The Committee therefore once again asks the Government to take the necessary measures to promote equality of opportunity and treatment in respect of employment and occupation with a view to eliminating any discrimination on the grounds of race, colour, religion and national extraction. The Committee also again asks the Government to provide information on any cases of discrimination in employment based on these grounds identified by or reported to the competent authorities, and on the manner in which they were dealt with. Please provide information on awareness-raising activities, such as training or seminars, on discrimination on the grounds of race, colour, religion and national extraction, among labour inspectors, judges and other relevant public officials, as well as employers, workers and their organizations.

Article 5. Special measures. Persons with disabilities. The Committee recalls the Government’s previous indication that the National Council on Persons with Disability was in the process of collecting data on persons with disabilities and on the implementation of the special incentive scheme for employing persons with disabilities. Noting with regret that the Government once again provides no new information in this regard, the Committee reiterates its request that the Government communicate such data.

Enforcement. Noting that the Government’s report is once again silent on this point, the Committee recalls that the monitoring and enforcement of equality and non-discrimination laws and policies is important in determining whether there is effective implementation of the Convention (see 2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, paragraph 868). The Committee therefore reiterates its request to the Government that it takes steps to enhance the capacity of law enforcement officials to identify and address discrimination in employment and occupation. Once again, the Committee asks the Government to provide information on any decisions of the courts, the National Labour Commission, the Commission on Human Rights and Administrative Justice, or any other competent body, as well as on any violations identified by, or reported to, labour inspectors and the manner in which such cases were addressed. Finally, the Committee again asks the Government to take concrete steps to revise the labour inspection form to include a specific reference to discrimination on all the grounds listed in the Convention, including to sexual harassment.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Guinea

Article 1(1)(a) and (b) of the Convention. Anti-discrimination legislation. Civil service. The Committee recalls that Act No. L/2014/072/CNT issuing the Labour Code of 2014 excludes public officials from its scope of application (section 2). It also recalls that section 11 of Act No. L/2001/028/AN of 31 December 2001 issuing the Civil Servants Regulations only prohibits discrimination between officials on the basis of political, trade union, philosophical or religious views, and on the basis of sex or ethnic origin. Since 1990 the Committee has been underlining the fact that legal protection against discrimination for civil servants is inadequate since it does not cover all aspects of discrimination based on race, colour, national extraction and social origin, and that applicants for employment in the civil service are not covered by section 11 of the Civil Servants Regulations. Noting the Government’s indication in its report that the Committee’s request to amend the legal provisions concerning discrimination will be referred to the Ministry of the Civil Service, the Committee trusts that the Government will take the necessary steps in the very near future to amend section 11 of Act No. L/2001/028/AN issuing the Civil Servants Regulations, so as to ensure that civil servants and applicants for employment in the public service are afforded protection against any direct or indirect discrimination on the basis of at least all of the grounds of discrimination covered by Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention. The Government is requested to provide information on any measures taken in this regard and on any complaint mechanism enabling applicants for employment in the civil service to lodge an appeal if they consider that they have suffered discrimination at the time of recruitment.

Discrimination on the basis of sex. Sexual harassment. The Government indicates in its report that, despite the penalties established by law, victims of sexual harassment hardly ever file complaints for sexual harassment. Noting that the Government recognizes the existence of victims of sexual harassment, the Committee requests it to take measures to prevent sexual harassment in employment and occupation, for example, by launching awareness-raising campaigns (such as, on the radio or through other media) or reinforcing prevention activities by the labour inspectorate in this area, and also measures to inform workers, employers and their respective organizations of their rights and obligations in this area. The Government is also requested to consider whether complaint and appeal mechanisms at the national level and within enterprises are sufficiently accessible, impose adequate penalties and have the capacity to stop sexual harassment.

Workers with Family Responsibilities Convention, 1981 (No. 156) (ratification: 1995)

Articles 3 and 6 of the Convention. National policy. Information and education. The Committee recalls that, according to Article 3 of the Convention, “with a view to creating effective equality of opportunity and treatment for men and women workers, each Member shall make it an aim of national policy to enable persons with family responsibilities who are engaged or wish to engage in employment to exercise their right to do so without being subject to discrimination and, to the extent possible, without conflict between their employment and family responsibilities”. Such measures belong in the context of the broader issue of gender equality. It is essential, therefore, that the policy be designed not only to eliminate all discrimination against workers with family responsibilities in law and practice, but that active measures should be taken to promote the principle of equality of opportunity and treatment for workers with family responsibilities in all areas of employment and occupation (see General Survey of 1993 on workers with family responsibilities, paragraphs 54–59). For almost 20 years, the Committee has been emphasizing that “family responsibilities” are not among the grounds of discrimination expressly prohibited by the Labour Code. The Committee notes the Government’s indication, in its report, that it will take steps to enable men and women with family responsibilities to enjoy their rights. Recalling that there is still no national policy concerning workers with family responsibilities, the Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures, in law and practice, to ensure that men and women workers with family responsibilities who so wish are able to access employment or be engaged in employment without discrimination and, if possible, without conflict between their employment and family responsibilities, including: (i) by expressly prohibiting in the Labour Code any discrimination on the basis of family responsibilities in all forms of employment and occupation, including at the recruitment level; (ii) by allowing workers with family responsibilities to be informed of their rights and to assert them; and (iii) by adopting a combination of support measures and public information and awareness-raising measures on the problems that workers with family responsibilities face, as well as measures to promote mutual respect and tolerance within the population.

Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100) (ratification: 1963)

Articles 1(a) and (b) and 2 of the Convention. Definition of remuneration. Equal remuneration for work of equal value. Legislation. In its previous comments, the Committee pointed out that section 4(2) of the Labour Code of 1987, which limited equal remuneration to work of the same nature and the same volume performed under identical conditions, was more restrictive than the principle of equal remuneration for work of equal value set out in the Convention. The Committee notes with satisfaction that section 53(5) of Labour Law No. 37/2015 which entered into force in February 2016, provides for “equal wage for men and women for work of equal value”. The Committee further notes that the term “wage” is defined as “any amount or benefit due to the worker in return for any work performed, including all allowances and wages due for overtime” (section 1(14)), in accordance with the Article 1(a) of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the application in practice of section 53(5) of the new Labour Law. It also requests the Government to take steps to raise awareness of the concept of “equal remuneration for work of equal value” among workers, employers and their respective organizations as well as enforcement officials and the general public.

Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) (ratification: 1959)

Article 1 of the Convention. Legislative developments. The Committee notes with interest the provisions concerning equality and discrimination in the Labour Law No. 37/2015 which entered into force in February 2016. In particular, the Committee notes that section 8 prohibits both direct and indirect discrimination in all matters relating to vocational training, recruitment and terms and conditions of employment. In section 1 of the new Labour Law, direct discrimination is defined as “any distinction or preference based on race, colour, sex, religion, religious community, opinion or political belief, origin and national extraction”, and indirect discrimination as “any exclusion, distinction or preference based on nationality, age or health condition, economic or social condition, affiliation to a trade union, and trade union activity and which has the effect of nullifying or impairing equality of opportunity or equality of treatment in employment and occupation”. Section 10 prohibits sexual harassment and harassment based on sex and appears to cover both quid pro quo and hostile environment harassment. The Committee further notes that section 11(2) of the Labour Law provides for sanctions (imprisonment for a period not exceeding six months and/or a fine not exceeding 1 million Iraqi dinars (IQD)) in cases of discrimination and sexual harassment. The Committee asks the Government to provide information on the application in practice of sections 8 and 10 of Labour Law No. 37/2015. It asks the Government to provide details of any complaints of discrimination or sexual harassment filed with the labour court, or details of any other complaint mechanisms, as well as any sanctions imposed. The Committee also asks the Government to take steps to raise awareness of the anti-discrimination provisions of the new Labour Law among workers, employers and their respective organizations as well as enforcement officials and the general public.

Article 2. National policy to promote equality of opportunity and treatment in employment and occupation. With respect to the formulation and implementation of a national equality policy, the Committee notes that the Government refers in its report to the adoption of Labour Law No. 37/2015. The Committee acknowledges that the adoption of legal provisions prohibiting discrimination on the basis of a number of grounds in employment and occupation constitutes an important step in addressing the matter covered by the Convention. Nevertheless, it draws the Government’s attention to the fact that the formulation and implementation of a national equality policy presuppose the adoption of a range of... specific measures, which often consist of a combination of legislative and administrative measures, collective agreements, public policies, affirmative action measures, dispute resolution and enforcement mechanisms, specialized bodies, practical programmes and awareness raising. Concrete and specific measures are necessary to address discrimination effectively and promote equality. The Committee asks the Government to take steps to promote equal opportunities and treatment in employment and occupation irrespective of race, colour, sex, religion, political opinion, social origin and national extraction, and any other prohibited grounds of discrimination. In particular, it asks the Government to introduce measures to provide equal opportunities for men and women, including men and women belonging to ethnic or religious groups, in the labour market in the public and private sectors, and to provide information on any measures taken in this respect. The Committee also asks the Government to take specific steps to promote tolerance and coexistence among religious and ethnic groups and raise awareness of the existing labour legislation prohibiting discrimination.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Ireland

Articles 1(1)(a) and 2 of the Convention. Gender discrimination and equality of opportunity and treatment for men and women. In its previous comments, the Committee had noted that a Constitutional Convention had voted in favour of recommending that article 41.2 of the Constitution, which provides that “mothers shall not be obliged by economic necessity to engage in labour to the neglect of their duties in the home”, be amended by replacing the word “mothers” with “carers”. The Committee had noted that this proposed amendment, while aiming at recognizing the role of caregivers in society, was likely to apply in practice mainly to women and that it might continue to hinder the inclusion of women in the labour market, or impede their ability to re-enter the labour market. It therefore requested the Government to ensure that the Constitution did not encourage direct or indirect stereotypical treatment of women in the context of employment and occupation. The Committee notes the Government’s statement in its report that the Programme for a Partnership Government, published in May 2016, proposed to hold a referendum on article 41.2 of the Constitution and that this referendum is not due to take place before 2018. It further notes the policy statement of the Irish Human Rights and Equality Commission (IHREC), on article 41.2 of the Constitution (June 2018) in which IHREC expresses the view that article 41.2 perpetuates gender stereotypes and that it should be amended to: (i) be rendered gender neutral; (ii) reference “family life”, and that “family life” should be understood as including a wide range of family relationships and include situations where family members do not live in the same house; and (iii) recognize and support care work, including parents and others providing family care. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken to implement the recommendations of the Irish Human Rights and Equality Commission. It further urges the Government to take the opportunity presented by the current constitutional review process to ensure that article 41.2 of the Constitution does not encourage, directly or indirectly, stereotypical treatment of women in the context of employment and occupation and to provide information on the specific steps taken in this regard.

Article 1(1)(a). Discrimination based on political opinion or social origin. The Committee recalls that in its previous comment, noting that the grounds of discrimination prohibited under the Employment Equality Act do not cover political opinion and social origin, it had asked the Government to take steps to ensure legislative protection against discrimination in employment and occupation based on political opinion and social origin, and to provide information on the progress made in this regard as well as on the measures taken to ensure protection against discrimination based on these two grounds in practice. The Committee notes with concern the Government’s repeated statement that it has no immediate plans to amend the equality legislation so as to include social origin and political opinion as prohibited grounds of discrimination. Recalling that is has consistently stated that where legal provisions are adopted to give effect to the Convention, they should include at least all of the grounds of discrimination set out in Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention, the Committee urges once again the Government to take steps to ensure legislative protection against discrimination in employment and occupation based on political opinion and social origin, and to provide information on any progress made in this regard. It also reiterates its requests to the Government to provide information on the measures adopted or envisaged to ensure protection against discrimination based on political opinion and social origin in practice.

Article 1(2). Inherent requirements of the job. In order to ensure that any exception to the principle of non-discrimination enshrined in the Convention is restricted to the inherent requirements of a particular job, the Committee previously urged the Government to take steps to amend the relevant provisions of section 2 of the Employment Equality Act which excludes from the Act’s scope “persons employed in another person’s home for the provision of personal services for persons residing in that home where the services affect the private or family life of such persons”. Section 2 thereby permits employers of domestic workers to make recruitment decisions on discriminatory grounds. The Committee notes the Government’s statement that while the exception in section 2 applies to recruitment, once in employment, discrimination is prohibited against such workers. The Government further indicates that employers are encouraged to implement non-discriminatory practices through the voluntary Code of Practice for Protecting Persons Employed in Other People’s Homes. The Committee notes however that this Code of Practice only protects domestic workers from discrimination once they are employed and not in their access to employment. It recalls in this regard that there are very few instances where the grounds listed in the Convention actually constitute inherent requirements of the job. For example, distinctions on the basis of sex may be required for certain jobs, such as those in the performing arts or those involving physical intimacy. These distinctions should still be determined on an objective basis and take account of individual capacities. Overly broad exceptions in equality legislation excluding domestic workers from the protection of discrimination in respect of access to employment, may lead to discriminatory practices by employers against these workers, contrary to the Convention. The Committee considers that the right to respect for private and family life should not be construed as protecting conduct that infringes the fundamental right to equality of opportunity and treatment in employment and occupation, including conduct consisting of differential treatment of candidates for employment on the basis of any of the grounds covered by Article 1 of the Convention where this is not justified by the inherent requirements of the particular job (see 2012 General Survey on fundamental Conventions, paragraph 830). In this regard, the Committee wishes to draw attention to the fact that: (i) no provision in the Convention limits its scope as regards individuals or branches of activity; and (ii) the protection afforded by the Convention includes all aspects of employment and occupation – including access to employment and to particular occupation. Welcoming the recent ratification by Ireland of the Domestic Workers Convention, 2011 (No. 189), the Committee refers the Government to its comments adopted in 2017 under that instrument. The Committee urges the Government once again to take steps to amend the relevant parts of section 2 of the Employment Equality Act, so as to ensure that any limitations on the right to non-discrimination in all aspects of employment and occupation are restricted to the inherent requirements of the particular job, as strictly defined.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111)

( ratification: 1959)

Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention. Discrimination on the basis of sex, race, colour or national extraction. Foreign caregivers. In its previous observation, the Committee recalled the decision of the High Court of Justice in Yolanda Gloten v. the National Labour Court, HCJ 1678/07, of 29 November 2009, excluding the application of the Hours of Work and Rest Law, 1951 (including provisions on overtime pay), to foreign women workers providing care on a live-in basis. In this connection, it noted the information provided by the Government with regard to a set of recommendations submitted by the governmental staff committee to the Minister of Economy, which included the following: (i) the Hours of Work and Rest Law and its regulations concerning overtime pay should be amended in order to clarify that live-in caregivers are not excluded from the scope of the law, emphasizing the difficulty of supervising their working hours; (ii) instead of overtime pay, live-in caregivers should be entitled to a comprehensive wage which should include payment for overtime at not less than 120 per cent of the monthly minimum wage; (iii) the weekly rest should be no less than 25 hours; (iv) the Wage Protection Law, 1958, should be amended in order to limit the rate of the wage that the employer can pay in food and drink to no more than 732 Israeli shekels (ILS) per month; and (v) the regulation which entitles the employer to deduct half of the sum for housing should be abolished with respect to live-in caregivers and deductions for various expenses should not exceed ILS409 in the caregiving sector only. The Committee requested the Government to ensure that female foreign workers are not being directly or indirectly discriminated against on the basis of sex, race, colour or national extraction, and to provide information on any differential impact between national and foreign workers with respect to the measures of protection or requirements applying to the caregiving sector. It also requested the Government to provide information: (i) on the measures adopted to give effect to the recommendations formulated by the governmental staff committee and any difficulty in this regard; and (ii) on any complaints submitted by female foreign and national caregivers with the authorities, indicating the nature of the complaint and the outcome thereof. The Committee notes that, in its report, the Government states its intention to adopt a gradual approach towards the implementation of the recommendations made to the Ministry of Economy to improve the situation of caregivers. The Committee recalls that the Convention applies to all workers, both nationals and non-nationals, in all sectors of activity, in the public and the private sectors, and in the formal and informal economy. Consequently, where certain categories of workers are excluded from general labour or employment law, it needs to be determined whether special laws or regulations apply to such groups and whether they provide the same level of rights and protection as the general provisions (see 2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, paragraph 742). The Committee recalls that all care workers, including foreign caregivers, must be effectively protected against discrimination in employment and occupation on the grounds set out in the Convention, including with respect to their conditions of work. On these issues, the Committee also refers to its observations on Convention No. 100 and the Migration for Employment Convention (Revised), 1949 (No. 97). Recalling the heavy dependence of the care sector on the work of live-in foreign caregivers, as noted in its comments on the Migration for Employment Convention (Revised), 1949 (No. 97), the Committee requests the Government to supply information on the concrete measures adopted or envisaged within the framework of the gradual approach to the implementation of the recommendations made to the Ministry of Economy with a view to ensuring that foreign women workers are effectively protected against direct and indirect discrimination on the basis of sex, race, colour or national extraction. in line with the Convention. It also reiterates its request for information on any complaints submitted by female foreign and national caregivers with the different authorities, indicating the nature of the complaint and the outcome thereof, as well as on any differential impact between national and foreign workers with respect to the measures of protection or requirements applying to the caregiving sector.

Articles 1 and 2. Equality of opportunity and treatment irrespective of race, national extraction or religion. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to continue to provide information on the various measures and programmes implemented to promote equal access to employment of Arab Israelis, Druze and Circassians, and their impact. The Government was also requested to provide up-to-date information, disaggregated by sex and sector of population, on labour force participation, unemployment and employment rates. The Committee notes the information provided by the Government in its report on the various measures implemented in the framework of Government Resolution No. 1539 of 2010 (five-year plan for economic development) under the coordination of the Authority for the Economic Development of the Arab, Druze and Circassian Sectors (AEDA) in 13 localities. These include microloans specifically directed at Arab women, entrepreneurship programmes for the Bedouin population, and the establishment of new one-stop employment centres, among others. The Committee notes the Government’s indication that the plan ended in 2014. On the other hand, the Committee notes Government Resolution No. 922 of 30 December 2015 approving the five-year plan for economic development of the Arab population for the period 2016–20, which allocates funds for action aimed at tackling gaps between the Jewish and Arab population in a range of domains, including education and employment. The Committee also notes the statistical information provided by the Government on the employment rate of the population, according to which, from 2012 to 2014, there was an increase of 1.3 and 3.9 percentage points in the employment rate of Arab men and women, respectively. The Committee further notes the Basic Law on the Nation-State, adopted by the Knesset on 18 July 2018, which recognizes, among others, Hebrew as the official language of Israel (article 4(a)), and confers on the Arabic language a “special status” to be further regulated by law (article 4(b)), providing however that this clause does not change the status given to the Arabic language prior to the adoption of the Basic Law (article 4(c)). The Committee also notes that article 10 of the Basic Law on the Nation-State recognizes: (i) Saturday and the Jewish holidays as official days of rest in the country; and (ii) the right of those who are not Jewish to honour their days of rest and their holidays, the exercise of which will be regulated by law. In this regard, the Committee recalls that the principle of equality of opportunity and treatment under the Convention shall apply to all aspects of employment and occupation, including terms and conditions of employment, such as hours of work, rest periods and annual holidays with pay. The Committee furthermore notes that, in its concluding observations, the United Nations Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW) expressed concern about the systemic discrimination experienced by national minorities, specifically women and girls belonging to the Arab and Bedouin communities (CEDAW/C/ISR/CO/6, 17 November 2017, paragraph 10). The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on the measures adopted to promote equality of opportunity and treatment in employment and occupation of the Arab, Druze and Circassian population and their impact, including information on any assessments undertaken on the results of the five-year plans and the follow-up actions envisaged or implemented. The Committee also requests the Government to monitor the impact of the Basic Law on the Nation-State on the employment of men and women from the Arab, Druze and Circassian population in both the public and the private sectors, so as to address any direct or indirect discrimination based on the grounds provided for in the Convention, including as regards language requirements for obtaining or retaining a job and for career progression opportunities, and to provide information in this respect. Please also continue to supply statistical information, disaggregated by sex and population group, on employment rates and participation in the various sectors and occupations.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Legislative framework. The Committee recalls that, in its previous observation, it welcomed the findings and recommendations of the legal review on pay equity conducted by the National Steering Committee for Pay Equity (NSCPE), with ILO support, and asked the Government to provide information on the steps taken to implement the recommendations arising out of the legal review as they relate to the Convention, in particular with respect to the proposed amendments to sections 4 and 29A(6) of the Labour Law, with a view, respectively, to: (i) explicitly defining and prohibiting direct and indirect discrimination based on at least all the grounds enumerated in Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention, in all areas of employment and occupation, and covering all workers; and (ii) providing clear protection and remedies with respect to quid pro quo and hostile environment sexual harassment. The Committee notes that the Government does not provide information in its report on any of these matters. It however notes that, in its concluding observations, the United Nations Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW) expressed concern about the harsh conditions and high risk of physical and sexual abuse faced by many girls engaged as domestic workers (CEDAW/C/JOR/CO/6, 9 March 2017, paragraph 43(b)). In this regard, the Committee wishes to emphasize the importance of taking effective measures to prevent and prohibit sexual harassment in employment and occupation and it to the Government, it is therefore inappropriate to separate not, and within the school or not, are potentially part of education, as teachers have an important influence in developing activities which are within the scope of their employment and occupation, and covering all workers, as well as providing clear protection and remedies with respect to quid pro quo and hostile environment sexual harassment. The Committee also requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken in practice to raise awareness of and prevent and protect against sexual harassment in employment and occupation and on any cases relating to sexual harassment dealt with by the courts or detected by the labour inspectorate, and their outcomes.

Article 5. Special measures of protection. Restrictions on women’s employment. In its previous observation, the Committee referred to section 69 of the Labour Code, under which the Minister shall specify industries and occupations in which the employment of women is prohibited and the times during which women are prohibited from working, and asked the Government to take the opportunity of the ongoing legislative review process to amend section 69 of the Labour Code and the corresponding Ordinance No. 6828 of 1 December 2010, to ensure that any restrictions on women’s employment are limited to maternity in the strict sense, and to provide information on any steps taken in this regard. Noting that the Government report is silent on this particular issue, the Committee recalls that protective measures applicable to women’s employment which are based on stereotypes regarding women’s professional abilities and role in society violate the principle of equality of opportunity and treatment between men and women in employment and occupation. It also wishes to stress that provisions relating to the protection of persons working under hazardous or difficult conditions should be aimed at protecting the health and safety of both men and women at work, while taking account of gender differences with regard to specific risks to their health (see 2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, paragraph 840). Such restrictions have to be justified (based on scientific evidence) and periodically reviewed in the light of developments and scientific progress in order to ascertain whether they are still needed and remain effective. In the absence of information from the Government, the Committee reiterates its request to the Government to take the opportunity of the ongoing legislative review process to amend section 69 of the Labour Code and the corresponding Ordinance, to ensure that any restrictions on women’s employment are limited to maternity in the strict sense, and to provide information on any steps taken in this regard.

Article 1 of the Convention. Discrimination on the basis of political opinion and inherent requirements of a particular job. School teachers. The Committee recalls its previous comments in which it expressed concerns regarding the prohibition of pre-school, primary and secondary school teachers from engaging in political activities. It further recalls that in June 2015, the Committee on the Application of Standards (CAS) of the International Labour Conference had urged the Government to provide more detailed information on the issue of possible discrimination on the basis of political opinion against teachers, so as to allow a solid assessment of the compliance of the related laws and practice with the Convention.

The Committee notes that, in its report, the Government recalls the constitutional requirement of political neutrality of education and declares that any activities of primary and secondary school teachers, whether they take place at work or not, and within the school or not, are potentially part of education, as teachers have an important influence in developing the characters and basic habit of primary and secondary school students who are receptive to what they learn. According to the Government, it is therefore inappropriate to separate “activities outside the classroom and the school and unrelated to teaching from any other activities of teachers”, and it recalls that this position has been upheld by the Korean Constitutional Court in its ruling of 25 March 2004. The Government concludes therefore that the current law does not impose an excessive restriction on teachers, as they are allowed nevertheless: (i) to express their political views, if they are not views from trade unions and other groups to which the teachers belong but are “personal”; and (ii) to engage in activities which are within the scope of their “personal” activities, as long as they do not constitute activities banned under the State Public Officials Act. In this regard, the Committee observes that section 65 of the State Public Officials Act does not permit public officials to “participate in an organization of, or join in, any political party or other political organization” or to “engage in the following activities to support or oppose a specified political party or person in an election: soliciting any person to cast or not to cast a vote; attempting, superintending, or soliciting a signed petition campaign; putting up, or causing another person to put up, documents or books at public facilities, etc.; raising, or causing another person to raise, any contribution, or using, or causing another person to use, public funds; soliciting another person to join or not to join a political party or any other political organization”. In addition, “no public official shall demand other officials to engage in any activity against paragraphs (1) and (2) [of section 65], or promise him/her any advantage or disadvantage as a reward or retaliation for any political activities” (section 65(3)).

The Committee wishes to recall that protection against discrimination on the basis of political opinion implies protection in respect of the activities of expressing or demonstrating opposition to established political principles and opinions. It also covers discrimination based on political affiliation (General Survey of 2012 on the fundamental Conventions, paragraph 805). The Committee also recalls that, although in certain circumstances restrictions with respect to political opinion might constitute a bona fide qualification for certain posts (an inherent requirement of the job), it is essential that such restrictions are not carried beyond certain limits, as such practices may then come into conflict with the Convention’s provisions calling for the implementation of a policy designed to eliminate discrimination on the basis of political opinion, in particular in respect of public employment (see 2012 General Survey, paragraph 831). Consequently, the inherent requirement of a particular job provision must be interpreted restrictively so as to avoid undue limitation of the protection that the Convention is intended to provide. In the case in question, the Committee cannot but reiterate that, in so far as political activities are held outside of the school establishment and are unrelated to teaching, a general prohibition of political activities does not constitute an inherent requirement within the meaning of Article 1(2) of the Convention. Therefore, disciplinary measures against teachers who engage in such activities constitute discrimination on the ground of political opinion, contrary to the Convention. Consequently, the Committee once again urges the Government to take immediate steps to ensure that elementary, primary and secondary school teachers enjoy protection against discrimination based on political opinion, as provided for in the Convention, regarding activities that are carried out outside the classroom and the school and unrelated to teaching, as well as measures to ensure that teachers are not subject to disciplinary measures for such reasons.

Article 1(2). Inherent requirements of the job. Political opinion and public officials. The Committee recalls that it had requested the Government to indicate the reason why prohibiting public officials from joining a political party and participating in political activities (sections 65(1) of the State Public Officials Act) was related to an inherent requirement of the job. The Committee notes the Government’s reply that this prohibition is aimed at guaranteeing public officials’ neutrality, protecting them from unfair intervention by political powers and helping enhance public interest in maintaining consistency and continuity of the administration. In addition to its comments in the above paragraph, the Committee wishes to point out that, political opinion may be taken into consideration as a prerequisite justified by the inherent requirements of a given job, only if this restriction applies to a narrow range of jobs and not for the entire public sector. Furthermore, the Committee recalls that the concept of “a particular job” refers to a specific and definable job, function or task; any limitation within the context of this exception must be required by the characteristics of the particular job, and be in proportion to its inherent requirements, and must be interpreted restrictively. The Committee considers that, in no circumstances should the same requirement involving one or more of the grounds of discrimination be applied to an entire sector of activity or occupation, especially in particular in the public sector (see 2012 General Survey, paragraph 828). Consequently, the Committee asks the Government to consider limiting the prohibition of political activities to certain positions and therefore to consider the possibility of adopting a list of jobs in the public service for which political opinion will be an inherent requirement. In the meantime, it requests the Government to provide information on the practical application of sections 65(1) of the State Public Officials Act, following the decision of the Constitutional Court, including on any disciplinary action taken.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Workers with Family Responsibilities Convention, 1981 (No. 156) (ratification: 2001)

The Committee notes the observations of the Federation of Korean Trade Unions (FKTU) and the Korea Employers’ Federation (KEF), as well as the Government’s reply to the FKTU’s observations, communicated with the Government’s report.

Article 3 of the Convention. National policy. Legislative developments. The Committee notes with interest the adoption of a new Framework Act on Gender Equality (Act No. 12698 of 28 May 2014), in particular article 24(3) and (4) (support to workers whose career is, or may be, impacted by pregnancy, childbirth or childcare); article 25 (guarantee of rights related to maternity and paternity); article 26 (measures for a harmonious work–family balance); and article 35 (calling for democratic and gender-equal family relationships); as well as the amendments to the Equal Opportunity and Work–Family Balance Assistance Act (Act No. 8781 of 21 December 2007, previously called the “Act on the Equal Employment of Both Sexes” or “Equal Employment Act”) in 2012, 2014, 2015 and 2016 in relation, inter alia, to the formulation of a basic plan for the realization of equal employment for both genders and work–family balance every five years (article 6-2); maternity leave benefits (article 18); paternity leave (article 18-2); childcare leave (article 19); reduction of working hours and other measures to support the worker during the period of childcare (articles 19-2 and 19-5); support by employers to workers who return to work after leave or a reduction of working hours in relation to family responsibilities (article 19-6); support for family care of workers, including prohibition of dismissal or discrimination against workers on the ground of family care leave, and inclusion of the period of family care leave in the period of continuous service (article 22-2); and penalty provisions and administrative fines (articles 37 and 39).
In its previous comment, the Committee asked the Government to provide information on the practical application of the Act on the Promotion of the Economic Activities of Career-Interrupted Women (No. 9101 of 2008) and the Act on the Promotion of Creation of Family-friendly Social Environment (No. 8695 of 2007), as well as the Second Basic Plan for Healthy Family (2011–15) and the Second Basic Plan on Low Birth Rate and Aging Society (2011–15), in the context of workers with family responsibilities, and on the process of enacting the Smart Work Promotion Bill. The Committee notes the Government’s indication that the latter bill was not adopted by the National Assembly and has been abandoned. It also notes that, in accordance with the Career-Interrupted Women Act, Basic Plans to Promote the Economic Activities of Career-Interrupted Women were established and implemented for the periods 2010–14 and 2015–18, with a particular focus on the prevention of career-breaks for employed women, the promotion of the re-employment of women whose careers had been interrupted, the reinforcement of childcare infrastructure and the establishment of a work–family balance environment. The Committee also notes that the United Nations Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW) in its concluding observations on the eighth periodic report of the Republic of Korea welcomed the adoption, inter alia, of the Second Basic Plan for Gender Equality Policies (2018–22) (CEDAW/C/KOR/CO/8, 14 March 2018, paragraph 5(b)). It also notes that the Ministry of Gender Equality and Family (MOGEF) informed the CEDAW, during the presentation of the Republic of Korea’s eighth periodic report on 22 February 2018, of the adoption of the Sixth Basic Plan for Gender Equal Employment (2018–22). The Committee notes that one of the six major projects of the Second Basic Plan for Gender Equality Policies concerns the creation of social infrastructure for work–life balance by strengthening social responsibility for care-giving, guaranteeing working parents’ maternal and paternal rights and fostering a family-friendly culture in the workplace. The Government underlines that it created 150 new job centres for women (as of July 2016) offering women whose careers had been interrupted customized employment support services such as employment counselling, vocational education and training, internships, job placement and follow-up management; and carried out two surveys on the actual status of economic activities of women whose careers had been interrupted with a view to collect statistical and policy data to inform new policies, including re-employment support. Under the Second Basic Plan for Healthy Family and the Second Basic Plan on Low Birth Rate and Aging Society, the Government selected key policy tasks such as childcare support (providing such support to more households, establishing and expanding cooperative childcare activities and spaces and operating after-school childcare services), capacity-building support for various types of families (including unwed mothers), building a family-friendly environment by expanding flexible work arrangements at public institutions and encouraging the use of childcare leave (including paternity leave), and introducing the “Father’s Month” incentive whereby if both parents take childcare leave in turn for the same child, the benefits for the second person taking childcare leave is increased to 100 per cent of the ordinary wage for three months (up to 1.5 million South Korean won). The Committee also notes the Government’s statement that it provided free childcare service for all groups of persons with infants, strengthening social responsibilities for childbirth and childcare, including by lowering the financial burden for child rearing for any household. According to the Government, the number of children covered by subsidies for childcare centres costs rose from 680,000 in 2006 to 1.48 million in 2014, and the number of children covered by child-rearing subsidies went from 680,000 in 2009 to 1.01 million in 2014. According to statistics available on the website of MOGEF, 63,546 families were using child-care services in 2017, in an increase 3.8 per cent compared to 2016 (61,221 families).

With regard to the family-friendly company certification system under the Act on the Promotion of Creation of Family-friendly Social Environment, the Committee welcomes the significant increase in the number of family-friendly certified corporations, from 1,363 as of December 2015 according to the Government’s report to 2,802 in 2017 according to statistics from MOGEF. The Government indicates that family-friendly certified corporations receive extra points in qualification assessment for government procurement as well as various benefits for bank investments and loans.

Welcoming these positive developments, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the application, in practice, of the Framework Act on Gender Equality, 2014 (Act No. 12698), as amended, and the Equal Opportunity and Work—Family Balance Assistance Act, 2007 (Act No. 8781) as amended. Noting the adoption of several plans aiming at gender equality in employment and support to workers with family responsibilities, the Committee also requests the Government to provide information on the concrete measures taken in application of these plans, the categories and number of workers benefiting from these measures and the results obtained. The Government is also requested to continue to provide information on the family-friendly company certification system, indicating the criteria taken into account and process to award the certification to a corporation.

Article 4. Leave entitlements for men and women workers with family responsibilities. The Committee notes the statistics on the recipients of childcare leave provided by the Government. While welcoming the significant increase, between 2011 and 2015, in the number of recipients (plus 50.2 per cent in general and plus 247.5 per cent for men) and in the financial amount of benefits provided (plus 124.3 per cent in general and plus 376 per cent for men), the Committee notes that, in 2015, men represented only 5.6 per cent of the childcare leave beneficiaries (i.e. 4,872 men out of 87,339 beneficiaries in total; the Government indicating that this ratio went up to 7.4 per cent in the first half of 2016) and only 4.4 per cent of the total amount of benefits received (it was, respectively, 2.4 per cent of beneficiaries and 2.1 per cent of benefits received in 2011). In its previous comment, the Committee requested the Government to indicate the underlying causes of the low number of men taking childcare leave and to take measures to promote the exercise of childcare leave particularly by men. It notes the Government’s explanation that this is due to the overall social and employment cultures, such as the long-standing practice of working long hours and fear of what the supervisor or co-workers might think. In addition, men are still the majority of the primary – if not the only – revenue earner in the family and some households may find it difficult to maintain their standard of living if the father takes childcare leave. The Government emphasizes that it has intensively promoted the need for paternity leave through the public–private work–family balance council and that the number of persons joining the “Father’s Month” system (explained above), which it adopted in 2014 and extended to three months in 2016, grew 3.4 times between 2015 and 2016. The Committee also notes that the following provisions to the Employment Opportunity and Work–Family Balance Assistance Act have been amended: article 18-2 to provide up to five days of paternity leave (three days paid); article 19(1) to raise the age limit of children, including adopted children, for purposes of determining parent’s eligibility for such leave, to under the age of 8 years; and article 19(5) in order, according to the Government, to protect fixed-term and temporary agency workers’ right to childcare leave. In this regard, the Committee brings the attention of the Government to the concluding observations of CEDAW which recommended it to continue to conduct awareness-raising campaigns and expand benefits, such as by raising the benefit level for maternity and paternity leave so as to enhance the incentives to share child-rearing responsibilities between parents (CEDAW/C/KOR/CO/8, paragraph 39 (c)). The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on the leave entitlements in practice, including statistical information, disaggregated by sex, on the number of beneficiaries of such entitlements. It encourages the Government to continue to take proactive measures to encourage more men to exercise their right to take leave for childcare, as well as to indicate the results achieved by such measures.

Working time arrangements. In its previous comment, the Committee asked the Government to provide detailed information on: (i) the use of the flexible working hour system and working hour saving system, including statistical information, disaggregated by sex, on the number of beneficiaries of such systems, as well as the impact of the latter on employment of workers with family responsibilities; and (ii) legislative amendments to provide the right to reduced working time during childcare periods. The Committee notes that the 2012 amendments to article 19-2 of the Equal Opportunity and Work–Family Balance Assistance Act introduced the right to reduced working time during childcare period. It also notes the Government’s statement that amendments are pending in the National Assembly to extend the period during which a flexible working hour system can be put in place (up to six months as from 2024) and introduce a working hour saving system. The Committee notes with interest the adoption, on 28 February 2018, of amendments to the Labour Standards Act (No. 8372 of 2007) in order to reduce the maximum statutory working hours from 68 hours to 52 hours (40 hours a week – the law specifying that the term “week” includes the Saturday and the Sunday – and up to 12 hours of overtime work, with work on holiday or weekend being counted as overtime work) with a gradual implementation according to the number of employees from 1 July 2018 (for workplaces with 300 employees or more) to 1 July 2021 (for workplaces with five to 50 employees, with the possibility for workplaces with less than 30 employees to work an additional eight hours of special overtime until 31 December 2022 if such an agreement is made between the employer and the employee). The Committee recalls that hours of work and the arrangement of working time are of central concern to workers with family responsibilities and that the improvement of working conditions has been found, in practice, to be highly supportive of policies for the promotion of equal opportunities and treatment between men and women in employment. Measures taken in this field, such as the reduction of hours of work, enable workers better to reconcile their work and family responsibilities and encourage men to become more involved in family matters. In addition, it recalls that paragraph 18(a) of the Workers with Family Responsibilities Recommendation, 1981 (No. 165) calls for the progressive reduction of daily hours of work and the reduction of overtime (see General Survey of 1993 on workers with family responsibilities, paragraphs 131 and 133). The Committee notes the Government’s indication that it has been encouraging companies to reduce working hours by offering financial support to small and medium enterprises and conducting labour inspections in sectors where overtime is common, while raising public awareness and creating a climate for addressing unnecessary long hours and night work. In this regard, the Committee notes the FKTU’s observations that men do more overtime working hours than women, which, in turn, has a significant impact on wages. Overtime compensation affects the practice of working long hours which creates an unequal employment environment with career discontinuity for women and a gender wage gap. The Committee also notes the Government’s reply to FKTU’s observations whereby it underlines that the gender gap in working hours, and the resulting wage gap, is attributable to a culture in which women usually bear more of the burden of childcare than men due to long working hours; and that it addresses the issue by making efforts to expand a business culture favourable to work–family balance. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the status of the amendments relating to the flexible working hour system and working hour saving system as well as detailed information on their usage. Please also provide information on the implementation of the 2018 amendments to the Labour Standards Act to reduce working hours, the trends in the average number of hours worked by men and women, as well as on any measures taken to address excessive overtime work and its impact on work–life balance.

Part-time work. In its previous comment, the Committee had asked the Government to: (i) indicate how the Fixed-term and Part-time Workers Act had facilitated the moving of workers with family responsibilities from full-time work to part-time work, and vice versa, with an indication of the number of men and women using this option and the number of women moving back to full-time work; and (ii) indicate how the issue of female concentration in part-time work is addressed in the context of reconciling work and family responsibilities. The Committee notes that the Government did not provide the required statistical information but that it is promoting “convertible part-time jobs” whereby workers may choose to work part time for a certain period of time, provided that they go back to full-time employment at the end of the period. The Government is providing employers, offering convertible part-time employment, subsidies to cover their expenses as well as “customized consulting”. In addition, it underlines that the right to reduce hours of work applies equally to men and women, encouraging both parents to work together in balancing work and family. The Committee notes the FKTU’s indication that, whereas women represented 35.4 per cent of regular workers and 53.8 per cent of non-regular workers in 2015, they accounted for 69.2 per cent of part-time workers and that most part-time jobs are not chosen voluntarily and are not properly paid in proportion to hours worked. The FKTU adds that the significant employment segregation by gender in part-time jobs could have a negative impact on the measures against gender-based discrimination, wage levels and career development. In reply, the Government indicates that the female (aged 15 to 64) employment rate has been on an upward trend for several years, reaching 56.8 per cent in July 2016. It states that a survey carried out from April to June 2016 showed that childcare was the main reason for choosing a convertible part-time job and that, during the period of childbirth and childcare, women prefer part-time jobs for work–family balance. The Committee also notes the observations from KEF which, based on statistics from 2015, underlines that the proportion of part-time workers among female wage workers is relatively low by international comparison (15.9 per cent whereas the average for the countries of the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development (OECD) was 25.9 per cent in 2015) and that the proportion of female workers among the entire part-time workers was 62.6 per cent (compared to 68.7 per cent for the OECD). The Committee notes however that, according to statistics published on the website of MOGEF, the “part-time women’s employment rate among total women’s employment”, as of August 2017, was 41.2 per cent, and the women’s share of part-time employment represented 55.2 per cent. Recalling, once again, that the assumption that the main responsibility for family care and the household lies with women, thus reinforcing stereotypical attitudes regarding the roles of men and women and existing gender inequality, runs counter to the objectives of the Convention, the Committee draws the Government’s attention to its direct request under the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111). The Committee requests, once again, the Government to indicate: (i) the number of men and women using the possibility of moving from full-time work to part-time work, and vice versa, and the number of women moving back to full-time work; and (ii) the measures taken to avoid female concentration in part-time work, in the context of reconciling work and family responsibilities.

Article 11. Employers’ and workers’ organizations. The Committee notes the information provided by the Government on the “Public–Private Work–Family Balance Council” which operates at both the national and regional level. At the national level, the Council is composed since May 2016 of representatives of the Ministry of Employment and Labour and other relevant ministries such as MOGEF, the Ministry of Welfare and Health and the Ministry of Strategy and Finance, representatives of the KEF, the Federation of Korean Industries, the Korea Chamber of Commerce and Industry, the Korea International Trade Association and the Korean Women Entrepreneurs Association, as well as representatives of the FKTU. It meets once every quarter. The objective of the Council is to monitor how work–family balance has been implemented, share best practices, implement public–private campaigns, understand the demand for better systems and identify and discuss areas for cooperation. At the regional level, the Council is composed, on a voluntarily basis, of heads of regional branches, municipal bodies, labour and management representatives, relevant agencies (such as the new job centres) and experts. It meets once a month. The Committee asks the Government to provide detailed information on the activities of the Public–Private Work–Family Balance Council and its recommendations relating specifically to workers with family responsibilities and to provide a copy of its annual report if any.

Enforcement. The Committee notes the Government’s indication that there is no information available on relevant judicial or administrative decisions addressing discrimination on the basis of family or care responsibilities. The Committee asks the Government to provide information on the supervisory authorities and enforcement mechanisms, including the labour inspectorate and the National Labour Relations Commission, giving effect to the provisions of the Convention, as well as any administrative or judicial decisions relating to the application of the Convention. It also asks the Government to provide information, including statistical data disaggregated by sex, studies, surveys or reports that may enable the Committee to assess how the principles of the Convention are applied in practice, and how progress is being made to address existing inequalities between men and women workers with family responsibilities and between those workers and workers without such responsibilities.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Kuwait

Article 1 of the Convention. Protection of workers against discrimination in employment and occupation. Legislation and practice. In its previous comment, the Committee recalled that constitutional provisions, while important, have generally not proven to be sufficient in order to address specific cases of discrimination in employment and occupation and that, in any case, article 29 of the Constitution does not cover all the grounds set out in Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention nor all forms of discrimination in employment and occupation. It urged the Government to take concrete steps to explicitly prohibit direct and indirect discrimination based on race, sex, colour, religion, political opinion, national extraction and social origin, with respect to all aspects of employment and occupation, and covering all workers. Recalling that addressing sexual harassment through criminal proceedings is normally not sufficient, it asked the Government to adopt specific legal provisions defining and prohibiting both quid pro quo and hostile environment sexual harassment in employment and occupation, and provisions addressing remedies and sanctions. The Committee notes that, in its reply, the Government refers once again to article 29 of the Constitution providing for equal rights without distinction on the basis of sex, origin, language or religion, as well as article 7 which provides that justice, liberty and equality are the pillars of society and that there is a firm bond of cooperation and mutual respect between citizens. The Government also indicates, once again, that the Criminal Code criminalizes sexual harassment in all its forms. The Committee notes that the Government, referring to article 70 of the Constitution, emphasises the fact that international treaties and Conventions have the force of law once they have been signed, ratified and published in the Official Gazette. They are therefore an integral part of the domestic legislation: all government bodies and institutions and all individuals are required to abide by their provisions and the courts must ensure that they are respected and protected. In this regard, the Committee recalls that constitutional clauses which expressly provide that international agreements and treaties prevail over national law, while important, do not exempt States from adopting national legislation to implement the principles laid down in the Convention. The provisions of the Convention, even where prevailing over national law, may not be sufficient in themselves to provide effective legal protection from discrimination to individual workers (see 2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, paragraph 851). The Committee once again: (i) urges the Government to take concrete steps to explicitly prohibit direct and indirect discrimination based on race, sex, colour, religion, political opinion, national extraction and social origin, with respect to all aspects of employment and occupation, including recruitment, and covering all workers; (ii) asks the Government to adopt specific legal provisions defining and prohibiting both quid pro quo and hostile environment sexual harassment in employment and occupation, and providing for remedies and sanctions; and (iii) in the meantime, asks the Government to take the necessary steps to ensure that all workers are protected in practice against all forms of discrimination, including sexual harassment, in employment and occupation and to provide full information in this respect.

Migrant workers, including domestic workers. The Committee notes that Kuwait’s sponsorship system (kafala) – under which migrant workers’ legal status is tied to their employers who act as their sponsors for obtaining a visa – has not been abolished. This system, which denies workers the opportunity of obtaining alternative employment, exposes migrant workers to abuse and undermines their ability to have recourse to means of redress. The Committee notes that, on 31 March 2016, the Public Authority for Manpower of the Ministry of Social Affairs and Labour published Decree No. 378/2016 allowing migrant workers in the private sector to transfer their sponsorship to a new employer without their current employer’s consent after three years has elapsed since the date of issue of their work permit and provided that they give 90 days’ notice to their current employer. The Committee understands, however, that this amendment to the sponsorship system does not apply to domestic workers. It recalls that all migrant workers must be protected against discrimination based, at least, on race, colour, sex, religion, political opinion, national extraction or social origin, as indicated in Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention.

The Committee notes with interest the adoption of the Domestic Workers Act (Act No. 68 of 2015) which, inter alia: (i) prohibits recruitment agencies from charging domestic workers any fees, either direct or indirect (article 4); (ii) prohibits recruitment agencies from advertising, promoting or categorizing them in any humanly degrading manner (including according to faith, gender, colour or cost) (article 5); (iii) specifies the particulars that must be contained in the recruitment contract (to be provided in both Arabic and English) (article 18) and (iv) gives domestic workers the right to be paid on a monthly basis (articles 7 and 20), the right to a weekly day off, annual paid leave, a 12-hour working day under national law, while important, do not exempt States from adopting national legislation to implement the principles laid down in the Convention. The provisions of the Convention, even where prevailing over national law, may not be sufficient in themselves to provide effective legal protection from discrimination to individual workers (see 2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, paragraph 851). The Committee once again: (i) urges the Government to take concrete steps to explicitly prohibit direct and indirect discrimination based on race, sex, colour, religion, political opinion, national extraction and social origin, with respect to all aspects of employment and occupation, including recruitment, and covering all workers; (ii) asks the Government to adopt specific legal provisions defining and prohibiting both quid pro quo and hostile environment sexual harassment in employment and occupation, and providing for remedies and sanctions; and (iii) in the meantime, asks the Government to take the necessary steps to ensure that all workers are protected in practice against all forms of discrimination, including sexual harassment, in employment and occupation and to provide full information in this respect.

The Committee notes with interest the adoption of the Domestic Workers Act (Act No. 68 of 2015) which, inter alia: (i) prohibits recruitment agencies from charging domestic workers any fees, either direct or indirect (article 4); (ii) prohibits recruitment agencies from advertising, promoting or categorizing them in any humanly degrading manner (including according to faith, gender, colour or cost) (article 5); (iii) specifies the particulars that must be contained in the recruitment contract (to be provided in both Arabic and English) (article 18) and (iv) gives domestic workers the right to be paid on a monthly basis (articles 7 and 20), the right to a weekly day off, annual paid leave, a 12-hour working day under national law, while important, do not exempt States from adopting national legislation to implement the principles laid down in the Convention. The provisions of the Convention, even where prevailing over national law, may not be sufficient in themselves to provide effective legal protection from discrimination to individual workers (see 2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, paragraph 851). The Committee once again: (i) urges the Government to take concrete steps to explicitly prohibit direct and indirect discrimination based on race, sex, colour, religion, political opinion, national extraction and social origin, with respect to all aspects of employment and occupation, including recruitment, and covering all workers; (ii) asks the Government to adopt specific legal provisions defining and prohibiting both quid pro quo and hostile environment sexual harassment in employment and occupation, and providing for remedies and sanctions; and (iii) in the meantime, asks the Government to take the necessary steps to ensure that all workers are protected in practice against all forms of discrimination, including sexual harassment, in employment and occupation and to provide full information in this respect.
recommended, inter alia, that the Government continue its efforts to completely abolish the kafala (sponsorship) system (CEDAW/C/KWT/CO/5, 22 November 2017, paragraphs 36(e) and 37(f)). The Committee also notes the Government’s statement that Act No. 69 of 2015 concerning the establishment of a closed joint stock company for the recruitment and employment of domestic workers was promulgated and the Kuwait Home Helper Operating Company has now been established with the objective of avoiding the negative aspects of recruitment agencies for domestic workers. It further notes the Government’s indication that the Domestic Workers Department (DWD) within the Ministry of the Interior, which is responsible for reviewing complaints filed by domestic workers, has received numerous complaints which were resolved by amicable means. The Committee asks the Government to provide information on the application, in practice, of the Domestic Workers Act No. 68 of 2015, including on the gaps regarding the effective protection of domestic workers from abuse, exploitation and violence emphasised by the Committee as well as the CEDAW. It asks the Government to indicate if the Kuwait Home Helper Operating Company has completely replaced the pre-existing recruitment agencies and to provide information on its functioning and, if available, a copy of the annual report on its activities. It requests that the Government continue to provide information on all steps taken or envisaged to review the sponsorship system and to ensure the full application of the Convention in respect of all migrant workers, as well as information, including statistics, on the results of the examination of complaints by the Domestic Workers Department.

Stateless persons or persons without nationality (Bidoons). The Committee notes that the Government attached to its report an information booklet from the Central Agency indicating that the estimated number of stateless persons or persons without nationality (Bidoons) – referred to by the Government as “illegal residents” – was approximately 100,000 in 2014. The Committee recalls that the Council of Ministers, by Resolution No. 1612 of 2010, adopted a road map to remedy this issue. The Committee notes the Government’s indication that the Central Agency, in cooperation with the Civil Service Commission, the Kuwait Chamber of Commerce and Industry and the Union of Cooperative Societies is doing its utmost to enable stateless persons to find employment in the public and private sectors as well as in self-employment. According to the Government, there are 2,571 public sector or cooperative sector employees belonging to this group. The Government emphasizes that the decision to establish the Central Agency shows its willingness to find a solution to this issue. The Committee notes, however, that the United Nations Committee on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination (CERD), in its concluding observations, remained deeply concerned by the situation of Bidoons, many of which have lived in Kuwait for generations but are deemed “illegal residents” by the authorities and recommended that the Government find a durable solution to the problem faced by Bidoons, including by considering naturalizing those who have lived in Kuwait for long periods and have a genuine and effective link to the State (CED/C/KWT/CO/21-24, 19 September 2017, paragraph 27). The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the results of the implementation of the road map adopted by the Council of Ministers (Resolution No. 1612/2010) and to provide information on the measures taken to ensure that all stateless persons or residents without nationality (Bidoons) are protected against discrimination in employment and occupation, including in accessing employment, on the grounds set out in the Convention. The Committee asks the Government to provide statistical data on the number of Bidoons living in the country and on their employment status.

Article 2. National equality policy. The Committee notes the Government’s indication that a technical cooperation project was signed with the International Labour Office in November 2014 setting out a number of activities relating to equality issues and that, through the implementation of these activities, there would be discussions on the formulation of a national policy. The Committee is aware that a seminar on equality and non-discrimination issues was held in November/December 2016. However, the labour law review that had been foreseen in the technical assistance programme documents has not been carried out. Recalling that the primary obligation of ratifying States is to declare and pursue a national policy designed to promote equality of opportunity and treatment in respect of employment and occupation, with a view to eliminating any discrimination in respect thereof, the Committee asks the Government to provide information on the progress made towards the development and implementation of a comprehensive national policy for the elimination of discrimination in employment and occupation with respect to all the grounds set out in the Convention, including measures to raise awareness on equality and non-discrimination issues.

Article 5. Special measures of protection or assistance. Work prohibited for women. The Committee notes the Government’s indication that Articles 22 and 23 of the Private Sector Labour Act (Act No. 6 of 2010) – which prohibit the employment of women at night (with some exceptions) and in work that is hazardous, arduous or harmful to health or violates public morals – aim to protect women in general, including pregnant women. In this regard, the Committee recalls that a major shift over time has occurred from a purely protective approach concerning the employment of women to one based on promoting genuine equality between men and women and eliminating discriminatory law and practice. It draws the Government’s attention to the distinction to be made between special measures to protect maternity, as envisaged in Article 5 of the Convention, and measures based on stereotypical perceptions of women’s capabilities and their role in society, which are contrary to the principle of equality of opportunity and treatment and constitute obstacles to the recruitment and employment of women. The provisions relating to the safety and health of workers should provide for a safe and healthy environment for both men and women workers, while taking account of gender differences with regard to specific risks to their health. Moreover, with a view to repealing discriminatory protective measures applicable to women’s employment, it may be necessary to examine what other measures, such as improved health protection of both men and women, adequate transportation and security, as well as social services, are necessary to ensure that women can access these types of employment on an equal footing with men (see 2012 General Survey, paragraphs 838–840). The Committee once again asks the Government to ensure that special measures for the protection of women are limited to that which is strictly necessary to protect maternity, and that these provisions do not impede access for women to employment and occupation. The Committee also invites the Government to consider the possibility of reviewing health and safety issues with a view to improving health protection for both men and women and adopting accompanying measures with respect to security and the availability of adequate transport and social services to enable women to access all types of employment on an equal footing with men. The Committee asks the Government to supply information on any measures adopted in this regard.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Lao People’s Democratic Republic

Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111)
(ratification: 2008)

Legislation. Scope of application. The Committee previously noted that the new Labour Law (2014) excludes from its application, among others, civil servants. It also noted that it was unclear whether section 6 of the Labour Law (2014) excluded domestic workers by providing that they must “comply with the working contract”. Recalling that the principle of the Convention applies to all workers, the Committee asked the Government to indicate how civil servants and domestic workers were protected against discrimination in employment and occupation. The Committee notes the Government’s indication in its report that the Law on Government Officials No. 74/NA, of 2015, prohibits discrimination against government officials. The Government also indicates that it protects domestic workers’ interests by promoting the conclusion of labour contracts. The Committee recalls that, no provision in the Convention limits its scope as regards individuals or branches of activity, and consequently all workers, including domestic workers, should enjoy equality of opportunity and treatment on the grounds of the Convention in all aspects of employment and that legal and practical measures are needed to ensure their effective protection against discrimination (see 2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, paragraph 795). The Committee therefore asks the Government to provide more specific information on how it is ensured that domestic workers are protected against discrimination on the grounds set out in the Convention. It further asks the Government to provide a copy of the Law on Government Officials No. 74/NA of 2015, in one of the official languages of the ILO, and to identify the provisions that protect civil servants against discrimination in employment and occupation on the grounds set out in the Convention.

Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention. Prohibition of discrimination. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that the new Labour Law (2014) defines discrimination in the workplace as “all action by the employer that hinders, is biased or limits opportunities for promotion and confidence on the part of the employee” (section 3(28)), and prohibits “direct or indirect discrimination by employers against employees in the labour unit” (section 141(9)). While there are provisions prohibiting gender discrimination, the Committee noted that the Labour Law (2014) no longer explicitly prohibits discrimination on the grounds of race, religion and beliefs, as previously provided for in section 3(2) of the Labour Law (2007), nor does it prohibit discrimination based on colour, political opinion, national extraction and social origin. The Committee therefore asked the Government to indicate the full list of grounds in respect of which discrimination is prohibited and the areas of employment and occupation that are covered under sections 3(28) and 141(9) of the new Labour Law (2014). It also asked the Government to provide information on how workers are protected in practice against direct and indirect discrimination and on the steps taken to promote workers’ and employers’ knowledge of the prohibited grounds of discrimination. The Committee notes that the Government’s report is silent on this issue, and therefore once again recalls the importance of clear and comprehensive definitions of what constitutes direct and indirect discrimination in identifying and addressing its many manifestations (see 2012 General Survey, paragraphs 743–745). It also notes that the Labour Law (2014) seems to prohibit discrimination by an employer towards its employees only, and recalls that the Convention covers a wider range of situations, including the situation of discrimination by an employee towards another employee. Finally, the Committee emphasizes that where legal provisions are adopted to give effect to the Convention they should include at least all the grounds set out in Article 1(1)(a), namely race, colour, sex, religion, political opinion, national extraction or social origin. The Committee therefore once again asks the Government to identify the full list of grounds of discrimination that are prohibited under sections 3(28) and 141(9) of the Labour Law (2014) and to clarify whether the prohibition of discrimination concerns both employment and occupation and applies equally to employers and employees. Please provide information on any administrative or judicial decisions applying and interpreting these provisions. The Committee once again asks the Government to indicate how workers are protected in practice against direct and indirect discrimination on all the grounds set out in Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention. It also reiterates its request that the Government provide information on any steps taken or envisaged to develop additional guidance for workers and employers, as well as law enforcement authorities, on the definition of direct and indirect discrimination and the prohibited grounds of discrimination in the Labour Law (2014).

Discrimination based on sex. Sexual harassment. Previously, the Committee noted that section 83(4) of the Labour Law (2014) allows a worker to bring an end to the employment contract in the event of harassment or sexual harassment on the part of the employer, or when the employer ignores that sexual harassment, and that section 141(4) prohibits employers from violating the personal rights of employees, especially female employees, through speech, sight, text, touch or touching inappropriate areas. However, the Committee noted that sexual harassment is not explicitly defined and prohibited in the Labour Law (2014), and that it is unclear how the above provisions protect workers from all forms of sexual harassment in employment, and provide for adequate remedies and sanctions. Recalling the importance of taking effective measures to prevent and prohibit both quid pro quo and hostile work environment sexual harassment, the Committee asked the Government to provide information on the measures taken to define, prevent and prohibit sexual harassment at work, and on the practical application of section 83(4) and 141(4) of the Labour Law (2014). The Committee notes the Government’s indication that sections 128 and 129 of the Penal Law (2005) prohibit rape and that, with the cooperation of tripartite constituents, no cases of sexual abuse in employment were detected. As the Committee emphasized in paragraph 792 of its 2012 General Survey, addressing sexual harassment only through criminal proceedings is normally not sufficient, due to the sensitivity of the issue, the higher standard of proof applicable, which is harder to meet, especially if there are no witnesses, and the fact that criminal law generally focuses on sexual assault or “immoral acts”, and does not cover the full range of behaviour that constitutes sexual harassment in employment and occupation. The Committee also considers that legislation under which the sole redress available to victims of sexual harassment is the possibility to resign, while retaining the right to compensation, does not afford sufficient protection for victims of sexual harassment, since it in fact punishes them and could dissuade victims from seeking redress. The Committee therefore asks the Government to provide information on the practical application of sections 83(4) and 141(4) of the Labour Law (2014), including with respect to cases of sexual harassment. The Committee also asks the Government to take action to define, prevent and prohibit sexual harassment in employment and occupation, both quid pro quo and hostile environment harassment, to provide for adequate sanctions and remedies, and to submit information in this regard. With a view to raising awareness on the issue, the Committee further encourages the Government to formulate and implement practical measures to prevent and eliminate sexual harassment in employment and occupation, in cooperation with employers’ and workers’ organizations, such as through guidebooks, training, seminars or other awareness-raising activities and to provide information on any progress made in this regard.

Article 1(1)(b). Other grounds. The Committee previously noted that sections 87(1), 100 and 141(2) of the Labour Law (2014) provide protection against discrimination on the basis of pregnancy, marital status and HIV status in recruitment and termination of employment, but no longer prohibits discrimination based on nationality, age or socio-economic status, which were previously included in the Labour Law (2007). It therefore asked the Government to identify the measures taken to ensure the same level of protection against discrimination in employment and occupation, in particular on the ground of socio-economic status. Noting the lack of information provided, the Committee reiterates its request that the Government identify the measures taken, in consultation with employers’ and workers’ organizations, with a view to maintaining the same level of protection against discrimination on the additional grounds previously contained in the Labour Law (2007), with respect to all aspects of employment.

Article 4. Activities prejudicial to the security of the State. For a number of years the Committee has been asking the Government to provide information on the application in practice of section 65 of the Penal Law (2005) which sets out a broad prohibition on activities considered to be prejudicial to the security of the State, including conducting “propaganda activities”, and to indicate how it ensures that this provision does not result in practice in discrimination based on political opinion in employment and occupation. The Committee notes the Government’s reference to section 44 of the Constitution, on freedom of association, and section 11 of the Trade Union Law (2007), on collective agreements. However, it notes with regret that the Government does not provide any information with regard to the practical application of section 65 of the Penal Law (2005). The Committee therefore once again asks the Government to provide detailed information on the practical application of section 65 of the Penal Law (2005), and in particular to indicate the steps taken to ensure that the provision does not in practice result in discrimination based on political opinion in employment and occupation, for example, by providing information on any complaints made by employees or extracts of any court decisions in this regard.

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Gender pay gap. The Committee recalls its previous comments in which it noted that, according to statistics published in October 2011 by the Central Statistics Office, in 2007 the gender pay gap was an estimated 6.2 per cent in services; 10.8 per cent in commerce; 21 per cent in agriculture; 23.8 per cent in manufacturing; and 38 per cent in transport and communications. In the absence of updated information in this regard in the Government’s report, the Committee once again requests it to take the necessary steps to gather, analyse and communicate data on the remuneration of men and women and wage gaps in the different sectors of economic activity, including the public sector, and for different professional categories. The Committee once again requests the Government to adopt specific measures to rectify gender pay gaps, including raising awareness among employers, workers and their organizations of the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value, and to provide information on any action taken to this end and on any obstacles encountered.
The Committee notes with regret that the Government’s report merely indicates that the new draft Labour Code is still under examination. The Committee is therefore bound to urge the Government to ensure that the draft Labour Code gives full legal expression to the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value, in order to facilitate a broad scope of comparison encompassing not only equal or similar work, but also work of an entirely different nature that is of equal value overall. Expressing the firm hope that the Government will be in a position to report progress on this matter in the near future, the Committee asks the Government to provide a copy of the relevant provisions when they have been adopted.

Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) (ratification: 1977)

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Protection of workers against discrimination, including sexual harassment. Law and practice. For more than 20 years the Committee has been requesting that the Government introduce a definition and a general prohibition of direct and indirect discrimination on the grounds set out in Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention, within the framework of the Labour Code reform, applicable to all aspects of employment and occupation. The Committee recalls that the Labour Code currently in force (the Labour Code of 1946, as amended) only covers discrimination between men and women in certain aspects of employment (section 26) and does not provide effective protection against all forms of sexual harassment, namely quid pro quo and hostile working environment sexual harassment. Indeed, the only section of the Code that could be applied in cases of sexual harassment is a provision that authorizes employees to leave their jobs without notice when “the employer or his representative commits the offence of molestation of the worker” (section 75(3)). The Committee recalls in this regard that legislation under which the sole redress available to victims of sexual harassment is the possibility to resign, while retaining the right to compensation, does not afford sufficient protection for victims of sexual harassment since it punishes them and could therefore dissuade victims from seeking redress (see 2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, paragraph 792). The Committee notes with regret that the Government’s report does not contain any information on the progress or content of the ongoing reform of the Labour Code. However, the Committee observes that, according to the third annual report (2015) on the implementation of the National Strategic Plan for Women in Lebanon (2011–21), the Ministry of Labour has prepared a bill criminalizing sexual harassment in the workplace. Consequently, the Committee urges the Government to take the necessary steps to ensure that the new Labour Code contains provisions defining and prohibiting direct and indirect discrimination on at least all of the grounds set out in Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention, in all aspects of employment and occupation, as defined in Article 1(3), and all forms of sexual harassment (quid pro quo harassment and the creation of a hostile working environment). The Committee once again asks the Government to provide information on any progress made with a view to adopting the draft Labour Code. In the absence of full legislative protection against discrimination, the Committee also once again requests the Government to adopt specific measures to ensure, in practice, the protection of workers against discrimination on the grounds of race, colour, religion, political opinion, national extraction and social origin, and against sexual harassment in employment and occupation, including measures to raise awareness of these issues among workers, employers and their respective organizations, in order to improve prevention.

Foreign domestic workers. Multiple discrimination. For more than ten years, the Committee has been examining the measures taken by the Government to address the lack of legal protection for domestic workers, most of whom are women migrants, since these workers are excluded from the scope of the Labour Code and are particularly vulnerable to discrimination, including harassment, on the basis of sex and other grounds such as race, colour and ethnic origin. The Committee notes that, in its concluding observations, the United Nations Committee on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination (CERD) noted with concern that “abuse and exploitation of migrant domestic workers continues to occur in spite of the measures taken by the State party”. The CERD also noted with concern that “victims are often not able to seek assistance when they are forcibly confined to the residence of their employers or when their passports have been retained”. The CERD recommended the following measures: “abolish the conditions that render migrant domestic workers vulnerable to abuse and exploitation, including the sponsorship system and the live-in setting”; “extend the coverage of the Labour Code to domestic work, thereby granting domestic workers the same working conditions and labour rights as other workers, including the right to change occupation, and subjecting domestic work to labour inspections”; “ensure that any specific legislation on domestic employment is aimed at tackling migrant domestic workers’ increased vulnerability to abuse and exploitation”; and “conduct campaigns to change the population’s attitudes towards migrant domestic workers and to raise awareness of their rights” (CERD/C/LBN/C/18–22, 5 October 2016, paragraphs 41–42). The Government reports that domestic workers are covered by the Code of Obligations and Contracts, and once again refers to the model contract and the Bill on the employment of domestic workers. The Government also indicates that a Bill to ratify the Domestic Workers Convention, 2011 (No. 189), was submitted to the Council of Ministers and that the national steering committee of the Ministry of Labour, which is responsible for examining relations between employers and domestic workers, is currently developing significant measures to guarantee compliance with contracts and abolish the sponsorship system. However, the Government states that this process will take time. In this regard, the Committee notes the Government’s indication that the Ministry of Labour and official bodies have not established restrictions regarding changes of employer and that this is an issue that only concerns the worker and the employer. Recalling its previous comments and noting with regret that the situation remains unchanged, the Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures, in cooperation with the social partners, to ensure genuine protection for migrant domestics workers, in law and practice, against direct and indirect discrimination on all of the grounds set out in the Convention, including against sexual harassment, and in all areas of their employment, either through the adoption of a bill on the employment of domestic workers or, more generally, within the framework of the labour legislation. The Committee asks the Government to supply information on any progress made in this regard and on any legislative changes to abolish the sponsorship system. The Committee asks the Government, in particular, to ensure that any new regulations envisaged on the right of migrant workers to change employers do not impose conditions or restrictions likely to increase these workers’ dependence on their employer and thus increase their vulnerability to abuse and discriminatory practices.

Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100) (ratification: 1962)

Article 1(b) of the Convention. Equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value. The Committee notes with interest the Government’s indication that under section 21 of the Labour Relations Act (LRA 2010), there shall be no discrimination in remuneration for work of equal value on the basis of race, colour, sex or religion. The Government further indicates that section 24 of the LRA 2010 prohibits discrimination between men and women in remuneration for work of equal value. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on any relevant court cases regarding the application of sections 21 and 24 of the LRA 2010.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Article 1 of the Convention. Definition and grounds of discrimination. Legislation. The Committee notes the Constitutional Declaration of August 2011 establishing a basis for the exercise of power in the transitional period until the adoption of a permanent Constitution. It notes that article 6 of the Constitution Declaration provides that Libyans are equal before the law, and that they enjoy equal civil and political rights and equal opportunities in all areas without distinction on the grounds of religion, belief, language, wealth, gender, kinship, political opinion, social status, or tribal, regional or familial adherence. The Committee notes that the principle of equality before the law and equal opportunities in article 6 of the Constitutional Declaration does not include reference to the grounds of race, colour, and national extraction, and that the term “social status” may be more restrictive than “social origin” contained in the Convention. The Committee further notes the draft Libyan Constitution, awaiting adoption by referendum, in which article 7 provides that men and women citizens are equal before the law and that any discrimination between them on the grounds of ethnicity, colour, language, sex, birth, political opinion, disability, origin or geographical affiliation is prohibited. The Committee notes, however, that the grounds of race, national extraction and social origin are not included in the prohibition of discrimination contained in the draft Constitution, and that this prohibition only covers citizens.

The Committee notes, from the 2017 Report of the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights (UNHCHR) on the situation of human rights in Libya, the adoption in 2015 of the Libyan Political Agreement (LPA 2015) which establishes a temporary executive authority, the Government of National Accord, which will remain in place until the adoption and implementation of the Libyan Constitution (A/HRC/34/42, paragraph 4). It notes that Governing Principle 8 of the LPA 2015 affirms the principle of equality between Libyans by providing for, among other things, “equal opportunity and rejection of any discrimination between them for whatever reason”. The Committee notes the Government’s general statement, in its report, that national legislation prohibits discrimination on the grounds of race, colour, sex, religion and national extraction. In this respect, the Government refers to section 3 of Law No. 12 of 2010 promulgating the Labour Relations Act (LRA 2010). However, the Committee notes that section 3 of the LRA 2010 prohibits discrimination only on the grounds of “trade union affiliation, social origin or any other discriminatory basis”, and that the grounds of race, colour, sex, religion, political opinion and national extraction are not explicitly mentioned. The Committee further notes that the LRA 2010 does not appear to contain a definition of discrimination. It draws the Government’s attention to paragraph 743 of its 2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, in which the Committee recalled that clear and comprehensive definitions of discrimination in employment and occupation are critical in identifying and addressing the many manifestations in which it may occur. Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention defines discrimination as “any distinction, exclusion or preference made on the basis of [certain grounds], which has the effect of nullifying or impairing equality of opportunity or treatment in employment or occupation”. Through this broad definition, the Convention covers all discrimination that may affect equality of opportunity and treatment. Any discrimination – in law or in practice, direct or indirect – falls within the scope of the Convention. The Committee further recalls that when legal provisions are adopted, they should include at least all of the grounds of discrimination enumerated in Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention. Consequently, the Committee asks the Government to:
(i) consider amending article 7 of the draft Constitution to ensure that the grounds of race, national extraction and social origin are included as prohibited grounds of discrimination;

(ii) include a definition of the term “discrimination” contained in section 3 of the Labour Relations Act (2010);

(iii) confirm that the grounds of race, colour, sex, religion, political opinion, and national extraction would be included in the terms “any other discriminatory basis” of section 3 of the Labour Relations Act (2010) and revise section 3 to make that apparent;

(iv) provide information on the concrete measures taken to ensure that direct and indirect discrimination on all of the grounds enumerated in Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention are prohibited, in law and in practice.

Articles 1 and 2. Discrimination on the basis of race, colour or national extraction. Sub-Saharan migrant workers. In its previous comments, the Committee observed the lack of measures taken by the Government to address discrimination against migrant workers, especially those originating from sub-Saharan Africa, on the basis of race, colour or national extraction in employment and occupation and to provide information on the steps taken to prevent and eliminate the occurrence of ethnic or racial discrimination in employment and occupation. The Committee notes that the Government’s report is silent on this point. The Committee notes, from the 2017 Report of the UNHCHR on the situation of human rights in Libya, that Sub-Saharan Africans are especially vulnerable to abuse as a result of racial discrimination (A/HRC/34/42, paragraph 45). The Committee further takes note of the statement of the United Nations Committee on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination (CERD) at its ninety-fourth session in 2017 under its Early Warning and Urgent Action Procedures, and deeply deplores that black persons from sub-Saharan countries are being sold in slave markets in Libya, and that they are subject to colour-based racial discrimination. With regard to the forced labour practices involving sub-Saharan migrant workers in Libya, the Committee refers to its detailed comments under the Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29). The Committee urges the Government to take immediate measures to address the situation of racial and ethnic discrimination against migrant workers originating from sub-Saharan Africa (including women migrant workers), in particular to bring an end to forced labour practices. It also asks the Government to provide detailed information on all of the measures it is taking to prevent and eliminate the occurrence of ethnic or racial discrimination in law and in practice in all aspects of employment and occupation. Further, the Government is asked to provide detailed information on the measures it is taking to promote tolerance, understanding and respect between Libyan citizens and workers from other African countries.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

[The Government is asked to supply full particulars to the Conference at its 108th Session and to reply in full to the present comments in 2019.]

Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100) (ratification: 1994)

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Equal remuneration for work of equal value. Legislation. The Committee takes note of the adoption of Law No. XII-2462 of 21 June 2016 establishing and implementing the new Labour Code, which entered into force on 1 July 2017. It notes that section 26(2)(4) of the new Labour Code provides that an employer shall ensure equal pay for work of equal value, and that section 140(5) provides that men and women shall receive equal pay for the same or equivalent work. “Same work” shall mean performing a work activity which, based on objective criteria, is the same as or similar to another work activity to such extent that both employees can be interchanged without a significant cost for the employer. “Equivalent work” shall mean that, based on objective criteria, the work does not require lower qualifications and is not less significant for the employer’s objectives than other comparable work. The Committee further notes the Government’s indication, in its report, that a draft Law is currently under consideration to establish uniform remuneration of workers in the public sector who perform work of the same complexity and requiring the same qualifications. The Committee draws the Government’s attention to the fact that even where the term “work of equal value” is provided for in the legislation, its scope may be narrower than the principle enshrined in the Convention as a result of too restrictive formulations requiring work of an equal level of complexity, responsibility and difficulty, or requiring the same qualifications (see 2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, paragraph 677). The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the practical application of sections 26(3) and 140(5) of the new Labour Code, including by providing examples of the manner in which the terms “work of equal value” and “equivalent work” have been interpreted in practice. It also trusts that the Government will take the necessary measures to ensure that the draft Law aiming at the harmonization of the remuneration of workers in the public sector will give its full expression to the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value enshrined in the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the status of the adoption of the draft Law, as well as a copy of the new legislation, once adopted.

Gender pay gap. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that the differential in men’s and women’s average gross hourly earnings had continued to decrease from 21.6 per cent in 2008 to 11.9 per cent in 2011. The Committee notes with concern, from Eurostat and Statistics Lithuania, that, since 2011, the gender pay gap (average gross hourly earnings) increased again to 15.6 per cent in 2015. In 2015, earnings of men exceeded those of women in all economic activities, except transportation and storage where women’s earnings were 9.5 per cent higher than those of men. The pay gap between men and women was still particularly wide in financial and insurance activities (38.5 per cent), information and communication (29.5 per cent), human health and social work activities (26.3 per cent), and manufacturing (25.6 per cent). The Committee notes the Government’s indication that the National Programme on Equal Opportunities for Women and Men for 2012–14 identified persistent discriminatory attitudes between men’s and women’s roles at work, and that therefore reduction of the gender segregation of the labour market and of the gender pay gap are still part of the priority goals of the new National Programme on Equal Opportunities for Women and Men for 2015–21, and its accompanying Action Plan for 2015–17. The Government states that, to this end, specific training on the improvement of gender equality in remuneration was conducted for employers from both the public and private sectors and educational events on equal pay for work of equal value were also planned in 2016–17 for social partners and companies. The Committee notes that the United Nations Human Rights Committee recently expressed concern about the persistent gender pay gap and recommended that the Government should strengthen its efforts to eliminate this gap by addressing differences in pay between men and women for work of equal value (CCPR/C/LTU/CO/4, 26 July 2018, paragraphs 15 and 16). The Committee trusts that the Government will make every possible effort to put an end to the increase and address the gender pay gap and its underlying causes, without delay, and requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken to this end, including in the context of the National Programme on Equal Opportunities for Women and Men (2015–21), as well as on the results achieved. Noting that section 23(2) of the new Labour Code provides that an employer who has more than 20 employees on average must submit to the work council and the trade union, at least once a year, updated information, disaggregated by sex and occupation, on the average pay of employees (except for managerial positions), the Committee requests the Government to continue to provide statistical information on the distribution of men and women in the different sectors of the economy and occupational levels and their respective levels of earnings.

Articles 3 and 4. Objective job evaluation. Cooperation with workers’ and employers’ organizations. The Committee previously noted that workshops were organized between 2006 and 2009 to introduce the methodology for the assessment of jobs and positions, which was approved by the Tripartite Council in 2005, to representatives of trade unions and financial and human resources managers of private enterprises, and that there were plans for carrying out a survey on the implementation of this methodology. The Committee notes the Government’s indication that a survey on the compliance with the methodology was conducted in July 2015 and, as a result, the Tripartite Council suggested an updating of the 2005 methodology at a further meeting. The Committee notes that section 26(2)(3) of the new Labour Code provides that an employer shall use uniform job evaluation criteria, and that section 140(3) provides that the remuneration systems are determined by collective agreement or, in the absence of such agreement (in workplaces with an average number of at least 20 employees) that it must be approved by the employer after information and consultation procedures, and be accessible to all employees. The Committee notes that such remuneration systems must list categories of employees by positions and qualifications, form of payment, highest and lowest pay rates for each category of workers, grounds and procedures for granting additional payments, and the pay indexation procedure. It further notes that, according to section 140(5) of the new Labour Code, the remuneration system must be designed in such a way as to avoid any gender discrimination or discrimination based on other grounds. The Committee notes from Eurostat that, in 2013, collective wage bargaining coverage of employees at all levels was only 19 per cent. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the status of the revision process of the 2005 methodology for the assessment of jobs and positions undertaken by the Tripartite Council, and to provide a copy of the new methodology, once adopted. It also requests the Government to provide information on the practical application of sections 26(2)(3) and 140(3) and (5) of the new Labour Code, including by indicating how it is ensured that remuneration systems are based on objective job evaluation methods that are free from gender bias. Taking note of the adoption of the National Action Plan for the Strengthening of Social Dialogue for 2016–20, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the steps taken, in cooperation with the social partners, to promote the principle of the Convention in branch, territorial and enterprise negotiations, and to ensure that work in sectors and occupations in which women are predominantly employed, is not being undervalued. Please provide information on any collective agreements containing provisions reflecting the principle of the Convention, as well as on any impact of the National Action Plan for the Strengthening of Social Dialogue in this regard.

Article 2 of the Convention. National equality policy. Referring to its previous comments, the Committee notes the Government’s indication, in its report, that, within the framework of the implementation of the Inter-institutional Action Plan 2012–14 on the Promotion of Non-Discrimination, several training and public events were organized. It notes that a new Inter-institutional Action Plan 2015–20 on the Promotion of Non-Discrimination was adopted. It notes, however, that the European Union recently pointed out the regular underfinancing of anti-discrimination programmes and roughly estimated that anti-discrimination measures planned for 2016 were given only 35 per cent of the initial budget (European Union, Country report on non-discrimination, 2017, p. 105). The Committee asks the Government to provide information on the concrete steps taken in the context of the Inter-institutional Action Plan 2015–20 on the Promotion of Non-Discrimination or otherwise, to effectively promote equality of opportunity and treatment in employment and occupation, with respect to all of the grounds covered by the Convention, and to address discriminatory practices, and to provide information on the impact of such actions. It also asks the Government to provide information on the number, nature and outcome of cases of discrimination in the fields of employment and occupation, including with regard to sanctions imposed and remedies provided.

Equality of opportunity and treatment of men and women. The Committee notes the Government’s indication that the National Programme on Equal Opportunities for Women and Men for 2012–14 identified persistent discriminatory attitudes concerning men’s and women’s roles at work. The Government also indicated that the promotion of equal employment opportunities for women and men and the reduction of sectoral and vocational labour market segregation are still one of the priority goals in the new National Programme on Equal Opportunities for Women and Men for 2015–21, and its accompanying Action Plan for 2015–17 which aims to increase opportunities for women, especially in rural areas, as well as self-employment. To this end, in 2015 and 2016 a number of activities were organized to promote women’s economic empowerment. In this regard, the Committee notes that several surveys, training and public information campaigns, were undertaken by the Equal Opportunities Ombudsperson, in particular to address gender discrimination in recruitment. It notes, from the report of the Ombudsperson that, in 2017, there were 312 cases of discrimination based on gender submitted which represented almost 44 per cent of all complaints, half of which referred to discrimination in labour relations. However, it observes that in 146 cases the Ombudsperson refused to examine the complaint as it considered that it was not competent to do so. The Committee asks the Government to provide information on the steps taken, in the context of the National Programme on Equal Opportunities for Women and Men 2015–21 and its accompanying Action Plan for 2015–17 or otherwise, to effectively reduce gender segregation in the labour market and to promote equality of opportunity and treatment of men and women in employment and occupation, including in recruitment, as well as on the results achieved. The Committee once again asks the Government to provide statistical information on the distribution of men and women in employment, disaggregated by economic sector and occupation.

The Committee requests the Government to strengthen its efforts, in collaboration with workers and employers or their organizations, to combat stereotypes and prejudices against national and ethnic minorities, including the Roma community, in education, employment and occupation, and effectively ensure equality of opportunity and treatment of those minorities, in conformity with the Convention. The Committee also asks the Government to provide specific information on the steps taken, within the framework of the Action Plan for Roma Integration into the Lithuanian Society 2015–20 or otherwise, to promote equal education and employment opportunities for members of the Roma community and the impact thereof. It further asks the Government to provide information on the number of cases where persons belonging to national and ethnic minorities, including the Roma community, have experienced racial stereotyping and discrimination in education, employment and occupation and whose cases have been reported to the Equal Opportunities Ombudsperson or the courts, as well as on the remedies provided.

The Committee notes with regret that the Government’s report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments initially made in 2016.

Articles 1(a) and (b), and 2 of the Convention. Equal remuneration for work of equal value. Legislation.

For a number of years, the Committee has been noting that the national legislation does not reflect fully the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value. It also noted that the definition of wages in the Employment Act 1955 and the National Wages Council Act 2011 does not encompass benefits in kind and excludes certain elements of remuneration as defined in the Convention. The Committee notes the Government’s indication that the suitability of incorporating the principle of the Convention into its national legislation will be examined in the framework of the ongoing review of its labour legislation, and more particularly of the Employment Act. Considering that giving full legislative effect to the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value is of particular importance to ensure the effective application of the Convention, the Committee trusts that, in the course of the review of its labour legislation, the Government will take specific measures, in consultation with employers’ and workers’ organizations, in order to expressly incorporate the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value into its national legislation. It also notes that the Government is in the process of reviewing the Labour Code in order to ensure that its national legislation allows for the comparison not only of the same jobs, but also of work of an entirely different nature which is nevertheless of equal value, taking into account that equality must extend to all elements of remuneration as indicated in Article 1(a) of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to provide information regarding the progress made in this regard. The Committee also reminds the Government that ILO technical assistance is available and requests the Government to consider forwarding a copy of the draft legislation to the Office for its review.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Mauritania

Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100) (ratification: 2001)

The Committee notes the observations from the General Confederation of Workers of Mauritania (CGTM) which were received on 31 August 2018. It requests the Government to provide its comments thereon.

The Committee notes that the Government’s report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments initially made in 2016.

The Committee notes the observations of the General Confederation of Workers of Mauritania (CGTM), dated 28 August 2015 and 30 August 2016, which highlight the existence in practice of significant gender discrimination in remuneration in relation to jobs of the same value. The CGTM also indicates that employers obstruct access for women to certain senior executive posts and points out that if women do reach that level, they do not receive the same treatment, they are paid a salary approximately 30 per cent lower than that of men, and they do not enjoy the same benefits linked to the posts that they occupy. The Committee notes that the Government, in its communication of 7 October 2015, rejects the CGTM’s allegations and states that there is no gender wage discrimination.

In June 2009, the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards urged the Government to amend the Labour Code and Act No. 93-09 of 18 January 1993 issuing the general regulations for officials and contract employees of the State, in order to give full expression to the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value in both the public and private sectors. Section 191 of the Labour Code provides that “under equal conditions of work, vocational qualification and output, wages shall be equal for all workers regardless of their origin, sex, age or status”, which is more restrictive than the principle established by the Convention. The general collective labour agreement (CCGT) of 1974 refers to “equal conditions of work and output” (section 37) and Act No. 93-09 does not contain any provisions on equal pay. The Committee draws the Government’s attention to paragraphs 672–681 of its 2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, in which it explains the importance and the scope of the concept of “work of equal value” for enabling a comparison of different jobs since, because of historical attitudes and stereotypes regarding women’s aspirations, preferences and capabilities, women and men do not occupy the same jobs. The Committee recalls that, in determining the respective values of two jobs under comparison, factors such as working conditions and vocational qualifications are relevant but it is not necessary for each factor to be equal in value as it is the overall value of the job that counts, namely when all the combined factors are taken into account. In addition, experience has shown that insistence on factors such as “equal conditions of work, skill and output” can be used as a pretext for paying women lower wages than men. The Committee recalls that, when there are discriminatory provisions in collective agreements, governments should take the necessary steps, in cooperation with the social partners, to ensure that provisions of collective agreements observe the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value (see 2012 General Survey, paragraph 694). The Committee notes the Government’s indication in its report that it has asked the social partners to communicate their views on the future revision of the Labour Code and the general collective labour agreement (CCGT) in order to align these instruments to international labour standards. Noting once again the importance of the concept of “work of equal value” and in view of the persistent pay gap, the Committee trusts that the Government, in the context of the announced revision of the Labour Code and the CCGT, will soon take the necessary steps to amend section 191 of the Labour Code and section 37 of the CCGT and also Act No. 93-09 of 18 January 1993 so that they expressly establish the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value.

Application of the Convention in practice.

The Committee recalls that appropriate data and statistics are crucial in determining the nature, extent and causes of unequal remuneration between men and women, to set priorities and design appropriate measures, and to monitor and evaluate the impact of such measures and make any necessary adjustments (see 2012 General Survey, paragraphs 887–891). Referring to the conclusions formulated by the Conference Committee in June 2009 and in view of the lack of information on this subject, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary steps to equal opportunities and treatment. The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Morocco

Article 2 of the Convention. Equality of opportunity and treatment for men and women in employment and occupation. Public service. The Committee welcomes the indications provided by the Government in its report that, in the context of the Government Equality Plan (ICRAM 2012–16), the National Observatory of Gender Mainstreaming in the Public Service has been established. The Government indicates in this respect that 35 per cent of employees in the public service and 19 per cent of middle and higher-level employees are women. The Committee notes the study on the “Situation of women public employees in positions of responsibility in the public administration in Morocco”, published by the Observatory in 2012. The study identifies obstacles to access for women to these positions which are related, among other factors, to vocational segregation, the persistence of gender stereotypes and the issue of reconciling work and family responsibilities, the operation and behavioural standards in the public service (clientelism and networks, the sensitive issues of sexual harassment and discrimination), economic obstacles, and obstacles relating to the appealingness of positions of responsibility, as well as issues related to geographical mobility and transfers. The study also contains a number of recommendations, such as the reinforcement of the national policy of equality for men and women, the reforming of rules and practices relating to the appointment and management of personnel, the strengthening of the capacities of female civil servants, the introduction of affirmative action measures and the development of an environment conducive to the reconciliation of work and family life. In this respect, the Committee welcomes the adoption of “Basic Act No. 02-12 regarding the appointment to higher level positions under Articles 49 and 92 of the Constitution”, which was adopted on 17 July 2012 and covers the functions of persons in positions of responsibility in public establishments and enterprises and public administrations, setting as principles for appointment equality of opportunity and non-discrimination in all its forms in the choice of men and women candidates for higher-level positions, including in relation to political or trade union membership, language, religion, sex, disability, or any other reason that is incompatible with the principles of human rights and the provisions of the Constitution, as well as with gender parity. The Committee also notes the preparation of a study on the “Reconciliation of work and family for male and female civil servants in Morocco”, which recommends, among other measures, the reinforcement of existing statistical tools, the promotion of legislative measures and regulations to promote the reconciliation of work and family life, including parental leave, the development of family support services for personnel (crèches for young children), measures to make the working environment more favourable to equality between men and women and workers with family responsibilities, the placing of greater value on paid work for women and action to combat stereotyped gender roles (the preparation of an equality charter, information and awareness-raising measures). Noting that this information demonstrates the commitment of the Government to promoting genuine equality between men and women in the public service by combating the deep-rooted causes of inequalities and the numerous obstacles faced by women, the Committee asks the Government to provide information on any measures adopted in this respect, and particularly on the actions taken to give effect to the recommendations contained in the two studies referred to above. The Committee also asks the Government to provide information on the effectiveness in practice of Basic Act No. 02-12 and its impact on the appointment of women to higher-level positions in public establishments and enterprises and public administrations.

Gender equality. Private sector. With regard to the implementation of the Government Equality Plan (ICRAM 2012–16), the Committee notes the Government’s indication in its report that specific measures have been adopted to strengthen the enforcement of legislative provisions and regulations regarding work performed by women. It also notes that, according to a Government evaluation of the Plan, of the 156 measures envisaged, 117 have achieved an implementation rate of 100 per cent and that measures which it has not been possible to implement will be put into effect in the context of a second plan. The Committee notes the adoption by the Government on 3 August 2017 of the ICRM 2 Plan for the period 2017–21 which covers, among other areas, the increase of employment opportunities for women, the promotion of equality and action to combat discrimination and stereotypes. The Committee also welcomes the Government’s indications that it provides financial support to associations working to improve the working conditions of women and that in 2016 it organized the first Ministry of Employment and Social Affairs (MEAS) Trophy for vocational equality intended for enterprises which have made progress in ensuring that equality is taken into account in the enterprise culture and human resources management, as well as parenthood within a professional context. The Committee notes that this Trophy allowed 19 enterprises, out of 34 participants, which met the selection criteria, to be provided with a MEAS certificate, and that the Trophy was awarded to the first three enterprises. The Committee asks the Government to provide information on any measures adopted to improve the opportunities for women to access vocational training and employment, to diversify their employment opportunities and to combat gender discrimination and stereotypes. The Government is asked to provide detailed information on the results achieved in the context of the ICRAM and ICRM 2 Plans, particularly in relation to the participation of women in the labour market in urban and rural areas.
Body responsible for promoting equality and combating discrimination. The Committee welcomes the adoption on the second reading by the House of Councillors on 9 August 2017 of the Bill on the Authority for Parity and Action to Combat all Forms of Discrimination (APALD). The Committee asks the Government to provide information on the areas of competence, methods of work and composition of the APALD, and on the establishment of this institution and its specific activities to combat discrimination and to promote equality in employment and occupation.

Mozambique

Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100) (ratification: 1977)

Article 1 of the Convention. Legislation. Since 2009, the Committee has repeatedly requested the Government to take all necessary steps to amend section 108 of Labour Act No. 23/2007, which provides for the right to equal pay for equal work, with a view to ensuring that it fully reflects the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for “work of equal value”. Noting the Government’s indication that the principle of the Convention is covered by this provision, the Committee once again recalls that the concept of “work of equal value” includes, but goes beyond equal remuneration for “equal”, “the same” or “similar” work, and also encompasses work that is of an entirely different nature, which is nevertheless of equal value. The Committee once again asks the Government to take all necessary steps to amend section 108 of Labour Act No. 23/2007 in order to bring it fully in line with the Convention. The Committee also reminds the Government of the possibility of availing itself of ILO technical assistance to this end.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Namibia

Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111)
(ratification: 2001)

Article 1(1)(b) of the Convention. Additional grounds. Legislation. The Committee recalls its previous comments in which it noted that while the general non-discrimination provision of the Labour Act (section 5) includes the grounds of HIV and AIDS, degree of mental disability and family responsibilities, these grounds are not included under section 33 of the Act which prohibits unfair dismissal. The Committee notes the Government’s indication that a task force comprising representatives of workers, employers and the Government was set up and is reviewing the Labour Act section by section. The Government adds that the request from the Committee to consider including specific provisions prohibiting dismissal based on the grounds of HIV and AIDS status, the degree of physical or mental disability and family responsibilities with a view to ensuring consistency between sections 5 and 33 of the Labour Act, will be taken into consideration during this process. The Committee hopes that, further to the review process of the Act, the Government will amend the Labour Act so as to extend the prohibition on dismissal to ensure that dismissal on the grounds of HIV and AIDS status, the degree of physical or mental disability and family responsibilities is prohibited and therefore introduce consistency between sections 5 and 33 of the Labour Act. Recalling that section 6.2(2)(iii) of the 2007
National Policy on HIV and AIDS prohibits termination of employment on the grounds of HIV status or family responsibilities relating to HIV/AIDS, the Committee asks the Government to provide information on any case of a violation dealt with by labour inspectors and labour courts.

Articles 2 and 3. Implementation of the equality national policy and affirmative action. The Committee notes with interest the adoption of the National Human Rights Action Plan (NHRAP) 2015–19 which identifies as one of the main areas of focus “the right not to be discriminated against”, in particular with respect to certain groups including women, indigenous peoples, persons with disabilities and LGBTI persons. The Committee notes that the following actions are envisaged: (i) a comprehensive review of the regulatory framework to assess non-discrimination compliance; (ii) development of a White Paper on Indigenous Peoples’ Rights; (iii) research of comparable legal instruments providing protection of the rights of persons with disabilities and developing benchmarks (i.e. building design standards); (iv) research and review of laws and policies to identify and rectify provisions that discriminate against “vulnerable groups”
(i.e. women, children, elderly persons, sexual minorities, persons with disabilities and indigenous peoples); (v) the review of the Affirmative Action (Employment) Act (Act No. 29 of 1998) with a view to establishing the continued relevance of race as part of the affirmative action criteria; and (vi) the review of the current Racial Discrimination Prohibition Act (Act No. 26 of 1991) with a view to enacting new legislation against discrimination. In this regard, the Committee welcomes the publication by the Office of the Ombudsman of the Special Report on Racism and Discrimination that gives a full picture of the situation in the country, including in education and employment, and makes specific and detailed recommendations to the Government and the employers’ organizations to address all forms of discrimination in the country. Those recommendations include: (i) for the Government: to raise awareness among employers and employees of the prohibition of discrimination in employment and the remedies for victims; to develop and disseminate programmes and strategies to eliminate discrimination in employment; to provide support to victims; and to resolve speedily disputes relating to discrimination; and (ii) for employers’ organizations: to ensure that recruitment procedures, including job advertisements, are free from bias; to review qualifications and experience requirements to ensure their relevance for the job; to train senior and middle management to detect manifestations of discrimination in the workplace; to cooperate with workers’ organizations and representatives to develop procedures to deal with racial discrimination and other forms of discrimination, including sexual harassment; and to take steps to broaden the pool of candidates for jobs among “previously disadvantaged groups”. The Committee asks the Government to provide information on the implementation of the NHRAP (2015–19) regarding equality and non-discrimination issues, in particular with respect to any legislative developments and the adoption of practical measures such as awareness-raising campaigns for mutual tolerance and respect and appropriate training, and to communicate copies of any implementation or assessment reports available. The Committee also asks the Government to provide information on any measures taken or envisaged to implement the recommendations made by the Ombudsman in its report in the fields of education, training and employment, as well as information, where available, on any steps taken by employers’ organizations in this regard.

With respect to the implementation of the Affirmative Action (Employment) Act (Act No. 29 of 1998) to address the under-representation of persons within “designated groups” (i.e. “racially disadvantaged persons”, women, persons with disabilities), the Committee notes from the Government’s report containing data for the periods 2013–14 and 2014–15 and the Employment Equity Commission’s (EEC) Annual Report 2015–16, that there had been a 10 per cent increase in the number of reports received from relevant employers (that is, employers with 25 employees or more), totalling 763 for 2015–16. The number of employees covered by the affirmative action reports also increased by 18 per cent (199,126 employees across all industrial sectors for 2015–16). The Committee notes that, according to the EEC Report 2015–16, although the previous racially disadvantaged employees constituted 93 per cent of the total number of employees covered by the employers’ reports, only 28 per cent of them occupied positions at the executive director level (compared to 58 per cent occupied by “whites”). According to the same EEC Report, however, they improved their representation at the management level from 56 per cent in 2014–15 to 66 per cent in 2015–16. The EEC Report adds that for 2015–16, women represented only 44 per cent of employees at managerial positions (compared to 39 per cent for 2014–15), and persons with disabilities accounted for 0.4 per cent of the workforce. The Committee further notes from the Government’s report that the EEC pressed charges against a number of employers who failed to comply with the Affirmative Action Plan and 53 were convicted during 2014–15. In this regard, the Committee welcomes the Government’s indication that the assignment of a police officer to the EEC had a positive impact on the speedy and timely prosecution of the offenders. The Committee also notes the New Equitable Economic Empowerment Framework Bill 2015 which aims to promote the achievement of the constitutional right to equality and to bring about socio-economic transformation in order to enhance equity, social justice and empowerment of the previously disadvantaged majority, and to promote a higher economic growth rate, increased employment and more equitable income distribution. Noting the EEC Report’s conclusion that “the pace of progress towards an equitable representation of persons from designated groups is regrettably slow”, in particular at the upper levels of management and therefore at higher remuneration levels and noting too the under-representation of persons with disabilities at all occupational levels, the Committee asks the Government to step up its efforts to promote access to training and employment opportunities for designated groups, in particular at the managerial level and above, and to continue to review regularly the affirmative action measures to assess their relevance and impact. The Government is asked to provide information on any measures taken to this end and any legislative developments regarding the New Equitable Economic Empowerment Framework Bill 2015.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Papua New Guinea

The Committee notes that the Government’s report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments initially made in 2016.

Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention. Prohibited grounds of discrimination. Legislation. Referring to its previous comments regarding legal protection against discrimination on the basis of the grounds set out in Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention, the Committee welcomes the Government’s indication in its report that section 8 of the final draft of the Industrial Relations Bill prohibits direct and indirect discrimination on the grounds of race, colour, sex, religion, pregnancy, political opinion, ethnic origin, national extraction or social origin, against an employee or applicant for employment or in any employment policy or practice. The Government adds that further consultations were held between the National Tripartite Consultative Council (NTCC) and the State Solicitor’s Office in order to make final amendments to the Bill which was anticipated to be enacted in 2015. The Committee notes that the Decent Work Country Programme for 2013–15, which has been extended until 2017, has set as a priority the completion of the Industrial Relations Bill, and revisions of the Employment Act through the delivery of a new Employment Relations Bill. While noting that none of these Bills have been enacted to date, the Committee trusts that the Industrial Relations Bill will be adopted in the near future, and requests the Government to provide information on progress made in this regard. It also requests the Government to provide information on progress made concerning the review of the Employment Act 1978, and in particular sections 97–100, in collaboration with workers’ and employers’ organizations, with a view to aligning the provisions on discrimination with the Industrial Relations Bill and to bring them into conformity with the Convention.
Discrimination on the ground of sex in the public service. For over 15 years, the Committee has been referring to the discriminatory impact of section 36(2)(c)(iv) of the Public Services (Management) Act 1995, which allows calls for candidates to specify that “only males or females will be appointed, promoted or transferred in particular proportions”, and section 20.64 of General Order No. 20 as well as section 137 of the Teaching Services Act 1988, which provide that a female official or female teacher is only entitled to certain allowances for their husband and children if she is the breadwinner. A female officer or female teacher is considered to be the breadwinner if she is single or divorced, or if her spouse is medically infirm, a student or certified unemployed. The Committee notes with deep regret that despite the adoption of a new Public Services (Management) Act in 2014, which repealed the Act of 1995, section 36(2)(c)(iv) referred to above has been maintained. It however notes that the National Public Service Policy on Gender Equity and Social Inclusion (GESI) adopted in 2013, and its action plan, set as priority action the revision of employment conditions in order to ensure equal access and employment conditions for all individuals regardless of gender. Noting the discriminatory impact of section 36(2)(c)(iv) of the Public Services (Management) Act 2014, section 20.64 of General Order No. 20 and section 137 of the Teaching Services Act 1988, the Committee urges the Government to take expeditious steps to review and amend these laws in order to bring it in line with the requirements of the Convention. It also requests the Government to provide information on any measures taken as a result of the GESI policy and action plan and any progress made to ensure equality of opportunity and treatment between men and women in the public service.

Discrimination against certain ethnic groups. Referring to its previous comments concerning the allegations made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) on the increased violence against Asian workers and entrepreneurs, who were blamed for “taking away employment opportunities”, the Committee notes that the Government does not provide any information in this regard. The Committee once again requests the Government to investigate the allegations of discrimination against Asian workers and entrepreneurs including incidents of violence and to provide information on the results of such investigations. It also requests the Government to provide information on concrete measures taken to ensure protection in the context of employment and occupation, against discrimination on the grounds of race, colour, or national extraction, as well as on any measures taken or envisaged to promote equality of opportunity and treatment of members of different ethnic groups in employment and occupation.

Article 2. National equality policy. The Committee notes that the Government still does not provide information on a national policy specifically addressing discrimination on all the grounds enumerated in the Convention. With regard to discrimination based on sex, the Committee notes that some sections of the National Public Service Policy on Gender Equity and Social Inclusion of 2013 and the National Policy for Women and Gender Equality for 2011–15 seem to address the issue of gender equality in employment and occupation. The Committee recalls that, even though the relative importance of the problems relating to each of the grounds may differ for each country, when reviewing the situation and deciding on the measures to be taken, it is essential that attention be given to all the grounds of discrimination set out in the Convention in implementing the national equality policy, which presupposes the adoption of a combination of legislative and administrative measures, collective agreements, public policies, affirmative action measures, dispute resolution and enforcement mechanisms, specialized bodies, practical programmes and awareness raising (2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, paragraphs 848–849). The Committee again urges the Government to provide full particulars on the specific measures taken or envisaged, in collaboration with workers’ and employers’ organizations, to implement a national policy aimed at ensuring and promoting equality of opportunity and treatment in employment and occupation on all the grounds enumerated in the Convention.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Peru

Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100) (ratification: 1960)

The Committee notes the observations of the Association of Trade Unions Confederations of Peru (Association of Confederations), received on 28 September 2017, and of the Autonomous Workers’ Confederation of Peru (CATP), together with numerous trade union organizations, received on 2 September 2017, and also the corresponding replies of the Government. The Committee also notes the Government’s reply to the observations of the General Confederation of Workers of Peru (CGTP) of 16 September 2014, which were referred to in the Committee’s previous observation.

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Pay gap. In its previous observation, the Committee asked the Government to take steps to identify and tackle the underlying causes of the existing wage gap and to provide information on any developments in this respect, and on the measures taken to raise awareness of the principle of the Convention. The Committee also asked the Government to supply statistics, disaggregated by sex, on the distribution of men and women in the labour market and on their remuneration. The Committee notes the statistics supplied by the Government in its report, according to which the average monthly earnings of women in 2015 and 2016 amounted to 71.4 and 70.8 per cent, respectively, of men’s earnings. The Committee also notes the Government’s indication that, according to the March 2017 report on women in the Peruvian civil service, drawn up by the National Civil Service Authority (SERVIR), pay differences between men and women decreased from 24 to 16 per cent between 2008 and 2015, including because of the increased presence of women in occupations with better average remuneration. The Committee further notes the March 2018 report on women in the Peruvian civil service, according to which the pay gap increased from 16 to 18 per cent between 2015 and 2016. The Committee also notes the Government’s reference to the report “Gender gap 2017: Progress towards equality between men and women”, published by the National Institute of Statistics and Information Technology (INEI). The report indicates that: (i) the majority of working women are self-employed (35.7 per cent) or are unpaid family workers (17 per cent); (ii) by type of occupation, the smallest pay gap is found between professional and technical workers, and the largest gap between those working in agriculture, where women’s earnings are half those of men; (iii) one of the main reasons for existing gaps is the fact that women work fewer hours in order to take care of their families; and (iv) the acquisition of more educational qualifications by women does not necessarily reduce the earnings. difference in relation to men. Moreover, the Committee notes the observations of the CATP and the Association of Confederations, stating that employees receive different pay according to the type of contract, which makes the type of contract a significant variable in reducing the gender pay gap. The Committee also notes that the CGTP refers in its observations to the impact of the various labour regimes established in the national legislation on reducing earnings in sectors employing large numbers of women, with an impact on the existing pay gap. The Committee notes the Government’s reply to the observations of the CGTP indicating that: (i) national employment policies include strategies that seek to implement positive action mechanisms for women to reduce occupational sex segregation; and (ii) gender mainstreaming in such policies is a long-term process.

With regard to the measures taken to tackle the underlying causes of the existing pay gap, the Government states in particular that on 24 June 2017 Supreme Decree No. 068-2017-PCM was published, which provides that entities within the Executive Authority (ministries and public bodies) shall conduct an internal assessment of the gender pay gap and its causes, with a view to planning action to end gender pay inequalities. In this regard, the CATP and the Association of Confederations observe that public sector employees only account for 8.9 per cent of men in employment and 9.5 per cent of women in employment. Furthermore, the Committee also notes the Government’s indication, in reply to the observations of the CATP, to which the Committee referred in its previous observation, that: (i) the National Gender Equality Plan 2012–17 (Gender Equality Plan) addressed issues relating to the pay gap in the context of its strategic objective 5 (“guaranteeing the economic rights of women in conditions of equity and equality of opportunity in relation to men”); (ii) the Human Rights Plan 2014–16 included the objective of “reducing the gender pay gap”; (iii) the “Intersectoral Action Plan for the empowerment and economic autonomy of women” seeks, inter alia, to reduce gender disparities in terms of both access to employment and earnings; and (iv) a sectoral strategy for equality and non-discrimination in employment and occupation is being drawn up, which proposes, inter alia, to conduct an assessment of pay gaps and gender discrimination in the private sector. In this regard, the Committee notes Ministerial Decision No. 061-2018-TR of 23 February 2018, which approves the “Sectoral Plan for equality and non-discrimination in employment and occupation (2018–21)”. The Committee also notes that the Government provides information on the Cuna Más National Programme and the recognition of paternity and maternity leave, which are examined in its comments on the Workers with Family Responsibilities Convention, 1981 (No. 156). The Committee further notes that, according to information on the website of the Ministry for Women and Vulnerable Population Groups, the period of validity of the Gender Equality Plan was extended at the end of 2017 to enable a new plan to be designed for the next phase. With regard to these points, the Committee notes that the CATP and the Association of Confederations, in their observations of September 2017, emphasize in particular that: (i) the Gender Equality Plan focuses in particular on the public sector and there is no information indicating how the results of that Plan have contributed to reducing the gender pay gap; (ii) with regard to the Human Rights Plan 2014–16, no assessment, results or methodology have been presented on pay gaps in the public and private sectors; and (iii) the trade union confederations have not been called upon regarding the sectoral strategy referred to by the Government. The CATP and the Association of Confederations also refer to the lack of consistency in public policies. The Committee notes the Government’s indication that the successes achieved in implementing the abovementioned measures have contributed towards reducing or eliminating the factors that influence the gender pay gap. While duly noting all the above information and so as to be in a position to evaluate the results achieved through the different measures adopted to promote the principle of the Convention, the Committee requests the Government to: (i) systematically evaluate, in cooperation with the workers’ and employers’ organizations, the plans and programmes adopted to promote the principle of the Convention and to send detailed information on the results achieved in reducing the gender pay gap in the private sector and also on any follow-up action taken, including the definition of tasks and indicators designed to monitor the implementation of these actions; (ii) provide information on the results of assessments of the gender pay gap in the public and private sectors, and the follow-up actions taken in cooperation with workers’ and employers’ organizations; and (iii) continue providing information on the specific measures taken or planned to tackle the underlying causes of the existing pay gap, including information on any relevant measures taken in the context of the sectoral strategies on equality and non-discrimination and on the empowerment and autonomy of women, and their impact on reducing the gender pay gap.

With regard to awareness-raising measures, the Committee notes the information provided by the Government on the awareness-raising activities carried out in 2015 and 2016 on the subject of equal opportunities for men and women, and the initiative to award the “Safe and free of violence and discrimination against women” label to enterprises. It also notes the observations of the CATP and the Association of Confederations that it would be appropriate to evaluate the impact of the above activities. The Committee requests the Government to: (i) continue taking measures to promote better public understanding of the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value and to provide information in this regard, also indicating the beneficiaries of such measures; and (ii) continue sending statistics, disaggregated by sex, on the distribution of men and women in the labour market and on the remuneration received by men and women in each sector of economic activity.

Articles 1 and 3. Work of equal value and objective job evaluation. In its previous observation, the Committee urged the Government to take the necessary measures to adopt an objective job evaluation system without delay. It also asked the Government to provide more details of the “Guide to the application of the principle of equal remuneration for men and women”, which it was planned to draw up. The Committee notes the Government’s indications that: (i) the process of drawing up the guide could not go ahead for economic reasons; and (ii) the “Sectoral Plan for equality and non-discrimination in employment and occupation (2018–21)” includes in its strategic actions the adoption of a specific methodology for the evaluation of jobs without gender bias in order to ensure pay equality. The Committee also notes that the Government refers to the Act prohibiting Gender Pay Discrimination (No. 30709 of 26 December 2017), the objective of which is to prohibit pay discrimination between men and women by establishing categories, duties and remuneration that make it possible to implement the principle of “equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value” (section 1). While noting that the Act does not fully reflect the principle of the Convention, which also encompasses work of a completely different nature which is nevertheless of equal value, the Committee notes that the implementing regulations for the Act, adopted by Supreme Decree No. 002-2018-TR of 8 March 2018, provide, inter alia, that: (i) the employer must evaluate and group jobs together in scales of categories and duties, applying objective criteria, on the basis of the tasks involved, to the necessary skills for performing them and to the job profile (section 3.1); and (ii) should there be any allegations of direct or indirect gender-based pay discrimination, the employer must demonstrate that the jobs involved “are not equal and/or do not have the same value” (section 5.2). In this context, the Committee recalls that while the Convention does not prescribe any specific method for such an examination, Article 3 presupposes the use of appropriate techniques for objective job evaluation, comparing factors such as skill, effort, responsibilities and working conditions (2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, paragraph 695). Furthermore, the Committee notes that the CATP and the Association of Confederations observe that it would be appropriate to amend the Labour Productivity conditions (2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, paragraph 695). Furthermore, the Committee notes that the CATP and the Association of Confederations observe that it would be appropriate to amend the Labour Productivity and Competitiveness Act, since the duties in an employment relationship and the corresponding remuneration are currently fixed for each contract according to the outcome of negotiations between the employer and the worker concerned, thereby leaving the employer with some leeway to define duties and levels of pay that could have an impact on the application of the Convention. In view of the above, the Committee requests the Government to: (i) provide information on the job evaluation methodology drawn up as part of the Sectoral Plan for equality and non-discrimination in employment and occupation (2018–21); (ii) provide detailed information on the application of Act No. 30709 and its implementing regulations, and on its impact on promoting the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value; and (iii) indicate how the application of Act No. 30709 is ensured with respect to the situation observed by the CATP and the Association of Confederations regarding the Labour Productivity and Competitiveness Act.

Recalling the importance of ensuring that men and women have a clear legal basis for asserting their right to equal remuneration for work of equal value vis-à-vis their employers and the competent authorities and noting that Act No. 30709 refers to the principle of equal remuneration for “equal work” – which is narrower than the principle of the Convention – whereas its implementing regulations cover not only equal work but also “work of equal value”, the Committee requests the Government to harmonize its legislation so as to fully incorporate the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value, as enshrined in the Convention, and to provide information on any developments in this respect.

(ratification: 1970)

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Discrimination on the basis of sex, colour and race. In its previous observation, the Committee asked the Government to evaluate the impact on access to employment for women and indigenous workers and their conditions of employment, of the following instruments establishing special labour regulations and to provide information on them: Legislative Decree No. 1057 of 28 June 2007 establishing the administrative services contract (CAS); Act No. 28015 of 2 July 2003 and Legislative Decree No. 1086 of 27 June 2008 promoting the competitiveness, formalization and development of micro- and small enterprises and access to decent employment; Act No. 27360 of 30 October 2000 approving standards relating to the agricultural sector; and Act No. 27986 of 2 June 2003 concerning domestic workers. The Committee also asked the Government: (i) to provide statistics, disaggregated by sex, indicating the number of workers hired in the public sector under various types of contract and in the private sector under the terms of Acts Nos 28015, 27360 and 27986, and, where possible, indicating the proportion of indigenous workers; and (ii) to provide information on the measures taken to ensure the effective application of the legislation prohibiting discrimination in job vacancies on grounds of race, colour or sex.

The Committee notes the Government’s indication in its report that: (i) as a result of Act No. 29849 of 5 April 2012, the rights of public servants covered by the CAS scheme were increased (including maternity and paternity leave); (ii) the CAS is gradually being replaced by the scheme regulated by the Civil Service Act (No. 30057 of 3 July 2013), which seeks to establish a single, exclusive scheme for individuals who provide services in state entities, and for people responsible for the management of these entities, the exercise of their authority and the provision of the corresponding services; and (iii) in 2017, public servants on CAS contracts accounted for 22 per cent of public employment governed by special labour regulations, with 48 per cent of CAS posts occupied by women. The Government also provides information on various standards adopted between 2011 and 2017 in relation to issues of equality and non-discrimination, which apply to various public service schemes (including those established by the regulations implementing the Civil Service Act – adopted by Supreme Decree No. 040-2014-PCM of 11 June 2014 – and the Judiciary Career Act (No. 30483 of 27 May 2016)), and on the special measures adopted for women, particularly Act No. 30367 of 24 November 2015, which protects working mothers against unjustified dismissal (by providing that any dismissal on the basis of pregnancy, childbirth and its aftermath, or breastfeeding, which occurs during pregnancy or within a postnatal period of 90 days, shall be declared null and void) and extends the period of maternity leave from 90 to 98 days.

With regard to access to employment for indigenous men and women, the Committee notes the Government’s indication that the National Civil Service Authority (SERVIR) adopted a “Plan of action for the cross-cutting intercultural implementation of priority processes 2016–19” and has been preparing a study of indigenous persons’ level and type of access to the civil service, in particular at the local government (municipality) level. The Committee notes that SERVIR, according to information on its website, published a study in 2016 on “local government employees who speak indigenous or original languages”, which concluded that “there was no significant presence of such persons working in the local government departments covered by the study”, with a quoted figure of 4.8 per cent, of which 72 per cent were men and 28 per cent were women. The Committee also notes the Government’s reference to the formulation of a sectoral strategy for equality and non-discrimination in employment and occupation for the 2017–21 period, the goal of which is to ensure that women and groups entitled to special protection – including indigenous persons – enjoy equal conditions for exercising in practice their rights to find, keep and leave employment and to develop their productive potential. In this regard, the Committee notes Ministerial Decision No. 061-2018-TR of 23 February 2018, adopting the “Sectoral plan for equality and non-discrimination in employment and occupation 2018–21”. As regards the measures taken to apply the legislation prohibiting discrimination in job vacancies, the Government states that the Ministry of Labour and Employment Promotion (Ministry of Labour) adopted the “Guide of good practice for equality and non-discrimination in access to employment and occupation”, through Ministerial Decision No. 159-2013-TR of 10 September 2013. While noting this information, the Committee asks the Government to continue to provide information on the transition to the single system of labour regulations for the civil service and on the promotion of equality of opportunity and treatment for men and women workers, without discrimination on the basis of sex, colour or race, regarding access to employment and vocational training, and conditions of employment.

The Committee recalls that excluding certain categories or sectors from the scope of general labour law may adversely affect primarily workers of a particular sex or ethnic origin, and could constitute indirect discrimination in the context of the Convention (see 2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, paragraph 739). The Committee once again asks the Government to provide detailed information on the specific measures adopted as part of the “Sectoral plan for equality and non-discrimination in employment and occupation 2018–21” to combat discrimination and promote equality of opportunity and treatment in employment and occupation, and the impact of those measures.

Equality of opportunity and treatment for men and women. In its previous observation, the Committee asked the Government to take the necessary steps to ensure that the implementation of the “National gender equality plan 2012–17” effectively addresses existing problems of discrimination and promotes gender equality in terms of entering and remaining in the labour market. In particular, the Committee asked the Government to take specific measures to ensure that pregnant women can have access to and remain in employment, training and education, and to provide information in this regard. The Committee notes that the Government has provided information on: (i) the setting up of a bipartite working group by the Ministry of Labour and the General Confederation of Workers of Peru (CGTP) to address the main difficulties and challenges faced by women in the world of work and to propose action to foster and promote the rights of working women; (ii) the preparation of a study entitled “Focusing on gender equality and shared responsibility for care provision: Proposals for expanding care coverage for children under 5 years of age in Peru 2016–26”; (iii) the publication of the “Work–life balance: A guide to good practice”; and (iv) the above-mentioned special measures adopted for women. The Committee also notes the “Gender gap 2017” report of the National Institute of Statistics and Information Technology (INEI), which indicates that, despite the greater participation of women in the labour force in the last few decades, they still do not have equal employment opportunities and are frequently concentrated in “feminine” occupations, which are more precarious and informal. Moreover, the Committee notes that, according to the “Women in the Peruvian civil service” report produced by SERVIR and available on its website, women account for 47 per cent of public service staff and are concentrated in special career categories (55 per cent), due to the strong presence of nurses in the health sector and of pre-school and primary school teachers in the education sector. The above-mentioned report also contains the preliminary findings on the possible causes of unequal access to managerial posts; these identify prejudice against women, lack of experience and specialist qualifications for the posts concerned, and unwillingness to work long days, as among the leading factors. The Committee also notes the “National human rights plan 2018–21”, adopted by Supreme Decree No. 002-2018-IUS of 31 January 2018, whose strategic objectives include ensuring a country free of discrimination and violence, and ensuring that women can generate their own income. In this regard, the Committee notes that the United Nations Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW), in its concluding observations, expressed concern at the major constraints faced by rural women, including the absence of a gender-sensitive rural development policy (CEDAW/C/PER/CO/7-8, 24 July 2014, paragraph 37). With regard to the issues of shared responsibility for care provision, occupational segregation and equal remuneration, the Committee also refers to its comments on the application of the Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100), and the Workers with Family Responsibilities Convention, 1981 (No. 156). The Committee asks the Government to provide information on the specific measures taken by the bipartite working group of the Ministry of Labour and the CGTP and on the steps adopted as part of the “National human rights plan 2018–21” and the “Sectoral plan for equality and non-discrimination in employment and occupation 2018–21” to promote equality of opportunity and treatment for men and women, including measures designed to ensure that pregnant women have access to employment, training and education and can remain in them, and those designed to ensure that rural women have access to the necessary material goods and services for pursuing an occupation on an equal footing with men. The Committee once again encourages the Government to continue a systematic evaluation of the equality plans and programmes that have been adopted and asks it to provide information on their impact.

Qatar

The Committee recalls that at its 324th Session (June 2015), the Governing Body adopted the recommendations of its tripartite committee set up to examine a representation alleging non-observance by Qatar of the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111), made under article 24 of the ILO Constitution by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) and the International Transport Workers’ Federation (ITF). The representation concerned complaints of direct and indirect discrimination against women employed by the state-owned airline (GB.324/INS/7/9). In so doing, the Governing Body entrusted the Committee of Experts with following up the matters raised in the representation. These are examined below.

Follow-up to the conclusions of the Committee on the Application of Standards (International Labour Conference, 105th Session, May–June 2016)

The Committee also recalls the conclusions and the ensuing discussion that took place in the Committee on the Application of Standards (CAS) of the International Labour Conference in June 2016 in relation to the application of the Convention regarding: (i) compliance with the conclusions of the Governing Body; (ii) measures to define and prohibit direct and indirect discrimination in law and in practice; (iii) protection of domestic workers against discrimination; (iv) promotion of women’s employment; (v) measures to address sexual harassment; and (vi) amendment of Law No. 21 of 2015 which regulates the entry and exit of expatriates and their residence. These issues will be examined under the relevant Articles of the Convention.

The Committee notes the observations of the ITUC, received on 31 August 2016, on the discussion and the recommendations made by the CAS regarding the situation of migrant workers with respect to change of employer and exit permits (Kafala system).

Follow-up to the recommendations of the tripartite committee (representation made under article 24 of the ILO Constitution)

Welcoming the detailed information provided by the Government in its report, the Committee notes with interest the progress made in the implementation of the recommendations made by the Governing Body, in particular the following:

(i) Discrimination on the grounds of pregnancy (paragraph 32 of the tripartite committee’s report) and provision of suitable alternative employment for pregnant employees who are temporarily unfit to fly (paragraph 35): the Committee notes from the Government’s report that the company no longer employs any cabin crew under the terms of the previous employment contract and that the new contract was amended to remove any clause allowing automatic termination of employment in the case of pregnancy and to add provisions on maternity as set out in the company policy. Finally, the Committee notes that the company stresses that it is committed to making effort to find suitable alternative employment for pregnant cabin crew which does not affect their health. The company also stresses that it provides pregnant women with an opportunity to work in ground services, such as training, staff welfare, housing management, standards and procedures and customers’ lounge divisions, during pregnancy. The Government states that, through its follow-up with the company, it has ascertained that as of December 2014 none of the airline’s crew members who had become pregnant left the company unless it was their wish to do so (between 1 January 2014 and 31 August 2017, there were 72 pregnancies among crew members: 26 crew members were transferred temporarily or permanently to ground services, 14 submitted their resignation after maternity leave, nine were still on maternity leave and 23 have returned to their work according to the flight schedule).

(ii) Prohibition in the company code of practice for women employees to be dropped off or picked up from the company premises accompanied by a man other than their father, brother or husband (paragraph 36): the Committee notes that the Government states that the prohibition is compulsory for both women and men employees, it only applies to being dropped off or picked up from the company premises and does not apply to employees’ housing. The Government states that this matter was effectively, and almost permanently, addressed through issuing informal warnings reminding persons concerned of the need to respect local traditions. It adds that the company guarantees to employees of both sexes full freedom in their social life without any interference from the company and without any impact on the employment relationship and that they are entitled to receive guests freely at the accommodation provided by the company.
(iii) Authorization by the company to get married (paragraph 40): the Committee notes that, according to the company, female cabin crew members are free to marry and change their social status in general, without having to obtain prior permission from the company, and can remain in service and change their status to obtain benefits for their spouse.

(iv) Rules governing rest periods (paragraph 42): the Committee notes the Government’s indication that the company asserts that the rules relating to the rest periods are applied without discrimination on the basis of sex and this matter will continue to be kept under close scrutiny.

(v) Ensuring that the application of rules and policies does not create or contribute to an intimidating working environment (paragraph 46): the Committee notes that specific changes were made by the company in its housing policies, such as provision of family housing, the possibility to change accommodation every six months, possibility to receive guests, etc. The Committee also notes the Government’s indication that the company is committed to improving the quality of life of cabin crew, including additional leave for most cabin crew.

(vi) Effectiveness of enforcement mechanisms in case of discrimination (paragraph 48): the Committee welcomes the Government’s actions to increase the number of female labour inspectors from 16 to 57 and their participation in the periodical inspection visits to the airline company, in particular those targeting the housing of female employees. The Committee further notes that a specialized course for labour inspectors was organized in cooperation with the ITF in September 2016 in order to develop their skills and strengthen their capacity through specialized inspection programmes in the field of aviation. The Committee further notes that the Ministry of Administrative Development, Labour and Social Affairs (MADLSA) has not received any complaints on discrimination.

Noting the positive developments detailed above, in response to the recommendations made by the Governing Body in 2015, the Committee asks the Government to continue to follow-up with the company the implementation of these recommendations, and to monitor its practices, in order to ensure that there is no discrimination against pregnant cabin crew members and that measures are taken to provide them with alternative suitable work during pregnancy. The Committee also asks the Government to continue to strengthen enforcement mechanisms, including their capacity to detect and address discriminatory practices. In this regard, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on any complaints of discrimination filed and the results thereof and also any identification of discriminatory practices by labour inspectors.

Legislative developments. The Committee notes with interest the adoption of the following laws since its last comments: Law No. 15 of 2017 which relates to domestic workers; Law No. 13 of 16 August 2017 which amends several provisions of Labour Law No. 14 of 2004 and Law No. 13 of 1990 which promulgates the Civil and Commercial Proceedings Law; and Law No. 13 of 2018 amending the provisions of Law No. 21 of 2015 which regulates the entry and exit of expatriates and their residence. The Committee also notes the adoption of Law No. 15 of 2016 issuing the Civil Human Resources Law which repeals the Human Resources Management Law No. 8 of 2009. Where appropriate, the Committee will examine the provisions of these laws under the relevant Articles of the Convention.

Article 1 of the Convention. Protection against discrimination. Legislation. The Committee recalls once again that the constitutional and legislative framework does not provide for a comprehensive legal framework defining and addressing discrimination based on at least all the grounds enumerated in Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention. In particular, it falls short of effectively prohibiting discrimination on the basis of political opinion, national extraction and social origin, and only provide protection against discrimination in certain aspects of employment. The Committee notes that the Government’s report once again describes the legal framework established by articles 34 and 35 of the Constitution which state that “Citizens are equal in public rights and duties” and that “People are equal before the law. There shall be no discrimination against them because of sex, race, language, or religion.” The Government further indicates that the Labour Law provides for equal opportunities and equal wages for men and women (section 93) and that there are provisions providing benefits specifically to working women: paid leave for women with a child with disabilities; paid delivery leave; breaks for breastfeeding; restrictions regarding their employment (hazardous and arduous work and hours of work); etc. The Committee recalls that constitutional provisions providing for equality of opportunity and treatment, although important, have generally not proven to be sufficient to address specific cases of discrimination in employment and occupation. A more detailed legislative framework is also required. The Committee reiterates its previous comments that given the persisting patterns of discrimination on the grounds set out in the Convention there is a need for comprehensive legislation containing explicit provisions defining and prohibiting direct and indirect discrimination on at least all of the grounds set out in the Convention, and in all aspects of employment and occupation, in order to ensure the full application of the Convention. The Committee has observed that a number of features of the legislation contribute to addressing discrimination and promoting equality, and it particularly welcomes legislation containing the following: coverage of all workers; provision of a clear definition of direct and indirect discrimination, as well as sexual harassment; the prohibition of discrimination at all stages of the employment process; the explicit assignment of supervisory responsibilities to competent national authorities; the establishment of accessible dispute resolution procedures; the establishment of dissuasive sanctions and appropriate remedies; the shifting or reversing of the burden of proof; the provision of protection from retaliation; affirmative action measures; and provision for the adoption and implementation of equality policies or plans at the workplace, as well as the collection of relevant data at different levels (see General Survey of 2012 on the fundamental Conventions, paragraphs 850–855). Recalling the absence of a clear and comprehensive legislative framework providing for protection against discrimination in employment and occupation through a clear definition of and prohibition on direct and indirect discrimination, the Committee once again strongly urges the Government to take the necessary steps to ensure that all workers without distinction whatsoever are protected in law and practice against discrimination with respect to at least all the grounds covered by the Convention, including political opinion, national extraction and social origin, and in all aspects of employment, including recruitment and terms and conditions of employment, both in the public and the private sectors.

Article 1(1)(a). Discrimination based on sex. Sexual harassment. The Committee recalls that, since 2006, it has been referring to the insufficiency of the legislative framework to ensure the prohibition and effective protection against sexual harassment in employment and occupation, in particular for female domestic workers who are particularly vulnerable to this kind of sex discrimination. It has therefore been asking the Government to take the necessary steps for the adoption of legal provisions expressly defining and prohibiting both quid pro quo and hostile environment sexual harassment against men and women workers in the public and private sectors and providing for effective mechanisms of redress, remedies and sanctions. The Committee notes the Government’s indication that “sexual harassment is a very complex matter because the perpetrator commits it in full secrecy, taking all the necessary measures, means and precautions so as not to expose his criminal conduct”. The Government once again refers in its report to the following legal provisions: sections 279 to 289 of the Penal Code which punishes “crimes of honour”; section 291 which provides for sanctions against any person who “offends a woman’s modesty”; and section 38 of the Law on Criminal Procedures which specifies that legal enforcement officers are under an obligation to accept complaints of crimes committed including sexual harassment, and to refer them immediately to the Public Prosecutor. The Government also states that there is no need for the inclusion of a provision in the Labour Law because both the Penal Code and the Law on Criminal Procedures are a more effective deterrent. However, the Committee would like once again to emphasize that, in general, addressing sexual harassment through the criminal law only is not sufficient due to the sensitivity of the issue, the fear of reprisals (the fear of losing one’s job), the complexity of the procedure and the higher standard of proof in criminal law. Furthermore, with respect to domestic migrant workers, the Committee observes that section 7(2) and (3) of Law No. 15 of 2017 concerning domestic workers provide respectively that the employer shall be responsible for “treat[ing] domestic workers well, in a manner which safeguard their dignity and well-being” and “avoid[ing] exposing a domestic worker’s health or life to danger, or harm him/her physically or morally in any manner whatsoever”. The Committee would like to point out that the provisions of Law No. 15 are limited to the behaviour of the employer and not any other possible perpetrator and the provisions of both the Penal Code and Law No. 15 of 2017 do not capture the full range of behaviours that constitute sexual harassment in the specific field of employment and occupation which can manifest itself verbally, physically, visually, psychologically or electronically. In its 2002 general observation, the Committee defined sexual harassment as containing the following elements: (i) quid pro quo (any physical, verbal or non-verbal conduct of a sexual nature and other conduct based on sex affecting the dignity of women and men which is unwelcome, unreasonable and offensive to the recipient; and a person’s rejection of, or submission to, such conduct is used explicitly or implicitly as a basis for a decision which affects that person’s job); or (ii) hostile work environment (conduct that creates an intimidating, hostile or humiliating working environment for the recipient) (see 2012 General Survey, paragraph 789). The Committee therefore urges the Government to take the necessary steps to explicitly define and prohibit, in the Labour Law No. 14 of 2004, Law No. 5 of 2017 concerning domestic workers and Law No. 15 of 2016 Issuing the Civil Human Resources Law, all forms of sexual harassment in employment and occupation committed not only by the employer but also by a co-worker, a customer or a supplier (or a member of the employer’s family or a friend of the employer in the case of domestic workers), against all men and women workers both in the public and private sectors. The Government is also asked to include specific provisions providing for effective mechanisms of redress, remedies and sanctions. The Committee further asks the Government to consider the development and implementation of a range of practical measures to address sexual harassment, such as help lines, awareness-raising campaigns, legal assistance or support units to assist victims of sexual harassment and specific training for labour inspectors. Finally, the Committee asks the Government to continue to provide information on the number of complaints of sexual harassment referred to the competent authorities, including criminal cases.

Articles 1 and 2. Non-discrimination of migrant workers. The Committee recalls that the vast majority of economically active workers in Qatar are migrant workers. The Committee also recalls that it has been referring since 2009 to the existing limitations on the possibility of migrant workers changing employers under the sponsorship system (Kafala), as a result of which migrant workers face increased vulnerability to abuse and discrimination, including on the basis of the grounds enumerated in the Convention such as race, colour, religion, national extraction and sex. In this respect, the Committee welcomes the fact that the replacement of the Kafala system by “an employment contractual system” is one of the five pillars of the Technical Cooperation Programme agreed between the Government of Qatar and the ILO, which was formally launched in November 2017 (see GB.334/INS/8, 24 October 2018, paragraphs 4, 13–15).

The Committee notes that, in its observations, the ITUC emphasizes that Law No. 21 of 2015 which regulates the entry and exit of expatriates and their residence falls short of addressing the issues raised by the Conference Committee of the Application of Standards regarding the abolition of exit permits. In this respect, the Committee notes with interest that, further to the adoption of Law No. 13 of 4 September 2018 amending the provisions of Law No. 21 of 2015 (entered into force on 13 December 2016), migrant workers covered by the Labour Law will be able to leave the country temporarily or depart permanently from the country during the period of the labour contract without having to obtain an exit visa. The law specifies that employers may submit for approval to the MADLSA a list of workers for whom an exit visa is still required, with a justification based on the nature of their work. The number of these workers per company shall not exceed 5 per cent of their workforce (new section 7). The Committee notes, however, that the above provisions do not apply to migrant domestic workers – as they are not covered by the Labour Law – and points out that the provisions restricting the change of employer remain unchanged, that is, only: (i) with the approval of the employer, the competent authority and the MADLSA before the end of the contract; (ii) with the approval of the competent authority and the MADLSA after the end of the limited duration contract or after five years of work with the employer for an indefinite duration contract (section 21); and (iii) upon acceptance by the Minister or the Minister’s representative if there is evidence of abuse by the employer or in the public interest or on a temporary basis if there are pending lawsuits between the worker and the employer (section 22). In this respect, the Committee notes that the ITUC points out that: (i) under section 21 of Law No. 21 of 2015, it is still not possible to change employer during a contract without the permission from the employer; (ii) under section 22, it is unclear on what basis the Ministry can refuse the transfer to another employer, and how “abuse” is established and also when a transfer is “in the public interest”. The ITUC concludes that the employer and the Government continue to maintain significant control over the worker and have broad discretion to determine whether he or she may change jobs. In addition, the ITUC observes that there are no specified conditions regarding the temporary transfer to another employer (up to one year) that may be authorized under section 23, with respect to the content of the new job and terms and conditions of employment. According to the ITUC, the ban of four years on re-entry of migrant workers, after dismissal on disciplinary grounds – with the decision being challenged – (section 26), appears quite severe especially as they face substantial barriers to accessing the justice system, as bringing a claim to a competent court is difficult in practice.

The Committee notes the Government’s indication that the MADLSA provides legal assistance and support to workers who are subject to abuse, including discrimination, in asserting his/her rights under the Labour Law and assistance to change employer immediately if he/she so wishes. The Committee also notes from the Government’s report that the MADLSA continues to implement awareness-raising campaigns on the rights of migrant workers, through newspapers, television and through social networks. It further notes that employment contracts must be approved by the Ministry and that an electronic contract system is operational online in ten languages to enable migrant workers to read the contract in his/her own language. In addition, the Committee notes from the information provided by the Government to the Governing Body that measures have been taken to improve migrant workers’ access to justice and to address violence and to develop cooperation partnerships at the regional level to strengthen the rights of migrant workers, in particular with the assistance of the National Committee for Human Rights (see GB.331/INS/13(Rev.), 31 October 2017, Appendix I, paragraph 17). The Committee also notes that, as of October 2017, 12 workshops have been held to inform both migrant workers and employers of their respective rights and obligations as specified in the law (see GB.331/INS/13(Rev.), Appendix I, paragraph 9). While noting the significant steps taken by the Government to remove of exit visas for migrant workers covered by the Labour Law, the Committee once again asks the Government to remove the restrictions and obstacles that prevent them from changing jobs, with reasonable notice; to re-examine Law No. 21 of 2015 in light of the above comments; and to clarify and provide a clear legal framework for the conditions of transfer to another employer, including on a temporary basis, with the assistance of the ILO Technical Cooperation Programme. In the meantime, the Committee asks the Government to provide support to migrant workers, especially domestic workers, seeking to change employer when subject to discrimination on the grounds enumerated in the Convention. The Government is also asked to continue to provide information on the application of Law No. 21 of 2015 in practice (number of applications to change employer and their outcomes).

Protection of domestic migrant workers against discrimination. Legislative developments and practical measures. Recalling that domestic workers are excluded from the scope of the Labour Law No. 4 of 2004, the Committee notes with interest the adoption of Law No. 15 of 22 August 2017 concerning domestic workers, which is a significant step in providing protection for domestic workers, including with respect to rights and duties of both parties, as regards working hours, rest periods, payment of wages, etc. The Committee notes that the law does not define or prohibit discrimination against domestic workers on the basis of the grounds enumerated by the Convention (i.e. race, colour, sex, religion, political opinion, national extraction or social origin). The Committee notes that section 17 of Law No. 15 of 2017 allows a worker to terminate employment without loss of bonus where there is a “serious danger which threatens safety or health, provided that an employer was cognizant of the danger, and had not sought to remove it”. The Committee considers that these provisions as well as the provisions of section 7(2) and (3) mentioned above may have been designed to address the issues of violence and harassment, including sexual harassment. However, it observes again that they remain too general and do not explicitly define nor cover the full range of behaviours that constitute harassment, including sexual harassment, in employment and occupation. Moreover, they do not provide for an appropriate procedure for bringing an end to such conduct, beyond the possibility of a worker terminating his/her contract, or for investigating complaints of such behaviour, or remedies. The Committee welcomes nonetheless the opportunity for domestic workers and their employers to refer disputes relating to Law No. 15 of 2017 or the employment contract to the dispute settlement mechanism newly established in Chapter 11bis of the Labour Law, as amended by Law No. 13 of 16 August 2017, in accordance with section 18 of Law No. 15 of 2017. The Committee notes, however, that there is no provision in Law No. 15 of 2017 allowing for domestic workers to change employer and recalls that this possibility is regulated by sections 21 to 23 of Law No. 21 of 2015 which apply to migrant workers, except for domestic workers. The Committee also recalls that the removal of the exit visa requirement by Law No. 13 of 2018 amending Law No. 21 of 2015 does not apply to domestic workers.
and that the rules and procedures regulating their exit from the country shall be determined by a ministerial decision (new section 7 of Law No. 21). The Committee observes from the statistical information provided by the Government to the Governing Body in October 2018 regarding the “crimes committed against female domestic workers” for 2015–16 (inter alia, 72 “physical or verbal aggressions”, nine rapes, 20 cases of sexual harassment, six cases of “sexual exploitation of the female worker”) that there might be an under-reporting of such crimes.

In light of the above, the Committee asks the Government to take the necessary steps to amend Law No. 15 of 2017 to include provisions defining and prohibiting: (i) discrimination based on at least all the grounds set out in the Convention and in all aspects of employment, including remuneration; and (ii) all forms of harassment, in particular both quid pro quo and hostile environment sexual harassment. It also asks the Government to ensure that dispute settlement mechanisms are accessible to and known by, domestic workers, and to continue to take steps, such as awareness-raising campaigns through the media or otherwise, to promote domestic workers rights and combat stereotypical views regarding domestic workers and the undervaluing of their work. The Committee further asks the Government to provide information regarding the possibility of domestic workers changing employers in practice. The Committee urges the Government to remove the requirement for exit visas on an equal footing with workers covered by the Labour Law.

Article 2. Equality between men and women in employment and occupation. The Committee notes from the Government’s report that “it has developed its strategic plans in pursuit of an optimal investment in the capacities of men and women and that, in spite of the cultural and social traditions which make this task difficult”, there has been progress in women’s engagement in education, training and the labour market. The Government adds that there is an evolution towards an increased female participation in the labour market (58.7 per cent in 2015). The proportion of working women out of all working-age women increased from 34.6 per cent in 2012 to 36.1 per cent in 2015, and the number of trained women increased from 29,000 in 2012 to 69,000 in 2015, including in the fields of management, information technology, oil and gas, mining, security, safety and handicrafts. The Government indicates, however, that women’s participation in the labour market is concentrated in fields, such as education, engineering and medicine. The Committee recalls that one of the goals of the Qatar National Vision 2030 is to increase and diversify participation of Qataris in the workforce through increased opportunities and vocational support for Qatari women and that this national strategy affirms that “women will assume a significant role in all spheres of life, especially through participating in economic and political decision-making”. While welcoming the emphasis put on education and training of women in the Qatar National Vision 2030, the Committee asks the Government to adopt proactive measures, and remove obstacles, with a view to facilitating and increasing the participation of women – Qatari and non-Qatari – in employment and occupation, in particular measures aimed at:

(i) promoting equal opportunities for men and women in employment and occupation, including through the promotion of neutral recruitment processes and the removal of obstacles to access to productive resources and equipment; and

(ii) combating stereotypical views regarding women’s aspirations and capabilities, their suitability for certain jobs or their interest or availability for full-time jobs.

In order to design appropriate measures, the Committee invites the Government to consider undertaking an assessment and analysis of the gender situation in respect of employment under its direct control and to encourage such an assessment and analysis in the private sector. The Government is also asked to continue providing up-to-date statistics, disaggregated by sex, concerning the participation of men and women in the various sectors of economic activity, in both the private and the public sectors, as well as statistics on the participation of both Qatari and non-Qatari women in education and vocational training.

Enforcement and awareness-raising. The Committee welcomes the detailed information provided by the Government in its report on the activities carried out by the labour inspectors. The Committee also notes that one of the five pillars of the Technical Cooperation Programme with the ILO concerns labour inspection and welcomes the signature of a protocol between the MADLSA and the ILO, aimed at providing assistance to workers wishing to submit complaints and the organization (in October 2018) by the MADLSA and the ILO of a workshop for labour inspectors and other government officials on equality and non-discrimination in employment and occupation, including a session devoted to the presentation of the requirements of the Convention (see GB.334/INS/8, 24 October 2018, paragraph 21). Emphasizing the important role of labour inspectors in combating discrimination, the Committee asks the Government to continue to reinforce the capacities of labour inspectors and other enforcement authorities to prevent, identify and address cases of discrimination and put an end to discriminatory practices in employment and occupation, and to organize awareness-raising campaigns, through the media or otherwise, on discrimination and equality. The Government is asked to continue to provide information on the number and nature of the violations detected by the labour inspectors and complaints examined by courts relating to discrimination in employment and occupation and on any obstacles faced by workers in submitting complaints.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.
Romania

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Discrimination based on religion. Access to education, training and employment. The Committee notes, from the European Commission’s website, that a draft bill to amend the Romanian Education Law was filed on 2 December 2017 and received a positive advisory opinion from the Economic and Social Council on 9 January 2018. The bill proposes the following additions to section 7 of the Education Law: “for the purpose of facilitating the identification of persons in educational units, institutions and all spaces used for education and professional training, it is prohibited to cover one’s face with any material which make it difficult to recognize the face, except for medical reasons. Infringement of these provisions constitutes a reason to deny access to the perimeter of the educational units, institutions and spaces for education and professional training.” The sanction, introduced as an amendment to section 360(1) of the Education Law would be a fine ranging from 5,000 to 50,000 Romanian Leu (RON) (approximately €1,100 to €11,000). The Committee notes that, if adopted, this new provision will be discriminatory towards those Muslim women and girls who wear a full face veil in terms of their access to educational or training institutions and might therefore limit their opportunities to find and exercise employment in the future – for reasons associated with their religious convictions, contrary to the Convention. Noting that this provision of the draft bill may have a discriminatory effect towards Muslim women who wear a full-face veil in terms of their possibilities of finding and exercising employment, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on: how it is ensured that this provision of the draft bill will not have the effect of reducing the opportunities of girls and women to access education and finding employment in the future; (ii) the progress of the draft bill in the legislative process; and (iii) to supply information on the number of girls and women who might be affected by the implementation of this new provision.

Articles 1(2) and 4. Discrimination based on political opinion. Inherent requirements of the job. Activities prejudicial to the security of the State. For a number of years, the Committee has been drawing the Government’s attention to the fact that the restriction set by section 54(j) of Act No. 188/1999, which provides that “to hold public office a person shall meet the following conditions: ... (j) shall not have been carrying out an activity in the political police as defined by the law”, could amount to discrimination on the basis of political opinion because it applies broadly to the entire public service rather than to specific jobs, functions or tasks. In its previous report, the Government had explained that, in order to clarify the legal norm and remove any possible inconsistency with the Convention, it had proposed an amendment to the current text of section 54(j) of Act No. 188/1999 as follows: “... was not a worker of the Securitate or a collaborator thereof, as provided by specific legislation”. According to the Government, “specific legislation” refers to section 2 of Ordinance No. 24/2008 which defines an “employee of Securitate” and a “collaborator of Securitate”. While understanding the Government’s concerns regarding the requirement for all government unit members to be loyal to the State, the Committee had drawn attention to the fact that, for such measures not to be deemed discriminatory under Article 4 of the Convention relating to activities prejudicial to the security of the State, they must affect an individual on account of activities he or she is justifiably suspected or proven to have undertaken. These measures become discriminatory when taken simply by reason of membership to a particular group or community. They must refer to activities that are objectively prejudicial to the security of the State and the individual concerned must have the right to appeal to a competent body in accordance with national practice (see 2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, paragraphs 832–835). The Committee therefore requested the Government to specify and define the functions in respect of which section 54(j) of Act No. 188/1999 would apply and to provide information on its application in practice. The Committee notes that the Government’s report does not contain any information in this regard. It notes, however, that the European Court of Human Rights (ECHR) (Naidin v. Romania, No. 38162/07) held that the barring of a former collaborator of the political police from public service employment was justified by the loyalty expected from all civil servants towards the democratic regime. In this regard, the Committee recalls that, under Article 1(2), political opinion may be taken into account as an inherent requirement of a particular position involving special responsibilities in relation to developing government policy, which is not the case of section 54(j) given that it applies to any state civil service position, whatever the level of responsibility. Further, the Committee recalls that the principle of proportionality must apply and that the exception under Article 4 should be interpreted strictly. The Committee urges the Government to take the necessary steps to amend section 54(j) of Act No. 188/1999 or to adopt other measures clearly stipulating and defining the functions to which this section applies. It also asks the Government to provide information on the application of section 54(j) of Act No. 188/1999 in practice, including information on the number of persons dismissed or whose application has been rejected pursuant to this section, the reasons for these decisions and the functions concerned, as well as information on the appeal procedure available to the affected persons and any appeals lodged and their results.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.
Russian Federation

The Committee notes the observations of the Confederation of Labour of Russia (KTR) received on 31 October 2017.

Article 1 of the Convention. Definition of discrimination. Legislation. In its previous comments, the Committee had noted that Federal Law No. 162-FZ amended section 3 of the Labour Code (prohibition of discrimination on the basis of listed grounds) so as to remove the adjective “political” before the word “convictions” (beliefs), and added “membership of other social groups”, and it therefore requested the Government to clarify whether the general term “convictions” also covers “political opinion” referred to in Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention. The Committee notes that the Government is silent on this point. Further, it notes that section 3 of the Labour Code only prohibits direct discrimination whereas sections 64 and 132 prohibit direct or indirect discrimination with regard to the conclusion of labour agreements and wage fixing respectively. In this regard, the Committee recalls that the concept of indirect discrimination is imperative to identify and address discriminatory situations in which certain treatment is extended equally to everybody, but leads to discriminatory results for one particular group protected by the Convention. Such discrimination is subtle and less visible, making it even more important to ensure there is a clear framework for addressing it, and proactive measures are required to eliminate it. Further, the Committee stresses that intention to discriminate is not an element of the definition in the Convention, which covers all discrimination irrespective of the intention of the author of a discriminatory act (see 2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, paragraphs 744–747). Noting that, in the absence of information on the impact of the amendments to section 3 of the Labour Code, it remains unclear if the term “conviction” covers “political opinion”, the Committee once again requests the Government to clarify whether the general term “convictions” (beliefs) also covers “political opinion” as referred to in Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention. In addition, it asks the Government to provide specific information on any measures taken to ensure protection against both direct and indirect discrimination. In the event that no information is available on relevant judicial decisions, the Committee asks the Government to consider amending the legislation to provide for an explicit prohibition of indirect discrimination and to include provisions aimed at eliminating such discrimination. Further, the Committee requests the Government once again to provide information on access to effective remedies, and to strengthen or establish mechanisms for the promotion, analysis and monitoring of equality of opportunity and treatment in employment and occupation for all the groups covered by the Convention.

Article 1(1)(a) Discrimination based on sex. Sexual harassment. The Committee recalls its previous comments in which it noted that section 133 of the Criminal Code on “compulsion to perform sexual actions” does not cover the full range of behaviour that constitutes sexual harassment in employment and occupation, in particular the creation of a hostile working environment. Noting that, once again, the Government’s report is silent on this point, the Committee recalls that criminal law in itself is not sufficient to effectively address sexual harassment in employment and occupation. As the Committee emphasized in paragraph 792 of its 2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, addressing sexual harassment only through criminal proceedings is normally not sufficient, due to the sensitivity of the issue, the higher burden of proof, which is harder to meet, especially if there are no witnesses, and the fact that criminal law generally focuses on sexual assault or “immoral acts”, and not the full range of behaviour that constitutes sexual harassment in employment and occupation. The Committee also considers that legislation under which the sole redress available to victims of sexual harassment is the possibility to resign, while retaining the right to compensation, does not afford sufficient protection for victims of sexual harassment, since it in fact punishes them and could dissuade victims from seeking redress. The Committee further recalls its 2002 general observation in which it stressed the importance of taking effective measures to prevent and prohibit both quid pro quo sexual harassment (any physical, verbal or non-verbal conduct of a sexual nature and other conduct based on sex affecting the dignity of women and men which is unwelcome, unreasonable and offensive to the recipient; and a person’s rejection of, or submission to, such conduct is used explicitly or implicitly as a basis for a decision which affects that person) and hostile work environment sexual harassment (conduct that creates an intimidating, hostile or humiliating working environment for the recipient). Therefore, recalling that sexual harassment undermines equality in employment and occupation by calling into question the integrity, dignity and well-being of workers and, in order to ensure an effective protection of workers against sexual harassment, the Committee once again requests the Government to take steps to include in the civil or labour law a clear definition and prohibition of both quid pro quo and hostile environment sexual harassment in employment and occupation. It also once again requests the Government to take active steps to prevent and address sexual harassment in employment and occupation in practice, and to raise awareness of employers, workers and their organizations of this issue. The Committee asks the Government to communicate information on the progress made in this respect.

Prohibition of discrimination in job advertising. The Committee recalls that Federal Law No. 162-FZ of 2 July 2013 amending Federal Law No. 1032-I on employment and other legislative acts, modified section 25 so as to explicitly prohibit the dissemination of advertisement of vacancies containing restrictions or establishing preferences on the basis of sex, race, colour, nationality, language, origin, property, family, social and employment status, age, place of residence, attitude to religion, convictions, membership or non-membership of voluntary associations or social groups, as well as any other factors not related to the qualifications of workers, except for cases where these restrictions or preferences are established under specific laws. The Code of Administrative Offences was also amended accordingly to introduce a definition of discrimination and to provide for fines in case of discrimination in job advertising. The Committee notes the KTR’s observations in which it alleges that despite the adoption of Federal Law No. 162-FZ of 2 July 2013, some job adverts containing discriminatory grounds of selection continue to be published, and that in practice, many employers and recruitment agencies who have stopped publishing discriminatory job adverts, still apply discriminatory criteria at the recruitment stage. Noting that the Government has not provided information nor commented on this point, the Committee requests the Government to provide its reply to the KTR’s observations. In addition, the Committee reiterates its request to the Government that it specify the legal provisions referred to in section 25 of the Law on Employment, as amended, and provide relevant administrative or judicial decisions so as to clarify the cases in which the prohibition of discrimination in recruitment does not apply, and the related grounds.

Articles 1 and 5. Discrimination based on sex. Special measures of protection. Since 2002, the Committee has been requesting the Government to revise section 253 of the Labour Code (prohibition to employ women in arduous, harmful or dangerous conditions) and Resolution No. 162 of 25 February 2000, which excludes women from being employed in 456 occupations and 38 branches of industry. It recalls that the Labour Code (sections 99, 113, 259, 298, etc.) contains specific provisions with respect to women who have children under the age of 3 years (or 1.5 years), particularly with respect to working time (overtime, night work, work in shifts, etc.). The Government indicated in 2014 that it had decided to amend Resolution No. 162 and that work was under way to introduce a general system of occupational risk management in cooperation with the social partners at each workplace. The Committee notes the KTR’s observations according to which in 2017, following the recommendation of the United Nations Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW), the Supreme Court held that the case of a woman who had been refused work as a navigation officer should be re-examined at the district level. The KTR observes, however, that the issue remains unsolved as the list of prohibited occupations and industries is still in force. The Committee notes the Government’s indication that it will consider the possibility of amending section 298 of the Labour Code, to allow women with children under the age of 3 years to work on rotating shifts, subject to their written consent. However, the Committee notes with concern that the Government repeats its previous statement that it does not consider that the other above-mentioned provisions amount to discrimination, as they merely reflect the State’s particular concern for persons in need of greater social and legal protection. Finally, the Committee notes from the 2017 concluding observations of the United Nations Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights (CESCR) that there is an ongoing discussion to review the list contained in Resolution No. 162 of 25 February 2000 (E/C.12/RUS/CO/6, 16 October 2017, paragraph 28). In this regard, the Committee recalls that a major shift over time has occurred from a purely protective approach concerning the employment of women to one based on promoting genuine equality between men and women and eliminating discriminatory law and practice. The Committee recalls that in its 2012 General Survey (paragraphs 838–840), it stresses the distinction to be drawn between special measures to protect maternity (in the strict sense), which come within the scope of Article 5 of the Convention, and measures based on stereotypical perceptions of women’s capabilities and their role in society, which are contrary to the principle of equality of opportunity and treatment. Provisions relating to the protection of persons working under hazardous or difficult conditions should be aimed at protecting the health and safety of both men and women at work, while taking account of gender differences with regard to specific risks to their health. Moreover, with a view to repealing discriminatory protective measures applicable to women’s employment, it may be necessary to examine what other measures, such as improved health protection of both men and women, adequate transportation and security, as well as social services, are necessary to ensure that women can access these types of employment on an equal footing with men. Consequently, the Committee urges the Government to take immediate measures to revise Resolution No. 162 and the Labour Code, in particular section 253, so as to ensure that restrictions applying to women are strictly limited to those aimed at protecting maternity, in the strict sense, and those providing special conditions for pregnant women and breastfeeding mothers, and that they do not hinder the access of women to employment and their remuneration on the basis of gender stereotypes. The Committee requests the Government to provide full information on any progress achieved in this regard, in consultation with workers’ and employers’ organizations.

Monitoring and enforcement. The Committee previously welcomed the increased efforts made by the labour inspectorate to strengthen the supervision and monitoring of compliance with the labour legislation relating to the protection of women (pregnant women, women with young children and women in rural areas) and persons with family responsibilities. However, recalling that claims for discrimination are only dealt with by the courts, and not by the labour inspectorate, it also noted the insufficient information regarding complaints for or relating to discrimination in employment and occupation submitted to the courts. It therefore requested the Government to provide information on the number and content of cases concerning discrimination.

The Committee notes the KTR’s allegations according to which the prohibition of discrimination contained in the legislation is ineffective because the labour inspectorate does not have the right to take any action against the employer and that filing a claim with the court does not lead to the effective protection and restoration of a worker’s rights. The Committee takes note of the Government’s indication that the labour inspectorate provides counsel and assistance to workers applying to the courts for discrimination issues. It also welcomes the adoption of Federal Law No. 272-FZ amending certain legislative acts of the Russian Federation in order to increase employers’ liability for breaches of the law. The Committee welcomes the Government’s indication that Federal Law No. 272-FZ amended section 29 of the Civil Procedure Code to permit citizens to institute legal proceedings for the restoration of their labour rights in the court closest to the plaintiff’s place of residence. However, the Committee notes with regret the continued lack of information provided by the Government with respect to the number and outcome of cases dealt with by the courts, making it difficult to assess whether the existing complaint mechanism is accessible in practice and allows workers to effectively assert their right to non-discrimination and equality under the Labour Code. The Committee recalls that where no cases or complaints, or very few, are being lodged, this is likely to indicate a lack of an appropriate legal framework, lack of awareness of rights, lack of confidence in or absence of practical access to procedures or fear of reprisals. The lack of complaints or cases could also indicate that the system of recording violations is insufficiently developed. The Committee further wishes to emphasize that the judicial process of individual complaints to courts, including providing appropriate remedies and imposing sanctions, remains a common feature in the enforcement of anti-discrimination and equal remuneration provisions. Courts have an important role in developing jurisprudence furthering the principle of the Convention, and in providing remedies including orders for compensation and reinstatement (see 2012 General Survey, paragraphs 870 and 883). The Committee therefore once again urges the Government to provide information on the number and content of cases concerning discrimination in all aspects of employment and occupation brought before the courts under the terms of the Labour Code, and on the outcome of such cases, as well as the impact of limiting the avenues for seeking redress solely to the courts. The Committee also requests the Government to take steps to strengthen or establish mechanisms to analyse and monitor equality of opportunity and treatment (or non-discrimination) for all groups covered by the Convention, and to provide information in this regard. The Government is further requested to provide information on any activity undertaken: (i) to raise awareness of the relevant non-discrimination legislation, to enhance the capacity of the competent authorities, including judges, labour inspectors and other public officials, to identify and address cases of discrimination; and (ii) to promote public understanding of the relevant legislation, such as through media campaigns or training delivered to social partners.

The Committee notes the observations of the Congress of Labour and Brotherhood of Rwanda (COTRAF-RWANDA) received on 24 June 2018. The Committee requests the Government to provide its comments in this respect. The Committee notes that the Government’s report contains no reply to its previous comments. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments initially made in 2016.

Articles 1(b) and 2 of the Convention. Equal remuneration for work of equal value. Legislation. The Committee recalls that the definition of the expression “work of equal value” which appears in section 1.9 of Law regulating Labour No. 13/2009 of 27 May 2009 refers only to “similar work” and is therefore too narrow to fully implement the principle of the Convention. It also recalls that this law does not contain any substantial provisions prescribing equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value and the Constitution only refers to “the right to equal wage for equal work”. The Committee notes that the Government continues to repeat that, in practice, there is no discrimination between men and women with regard to remuneration, and that full legislative expression will be given to the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value in the ongoing revision process of Law No. 13/2009. The Government also indicates that the revision will also address the linguistic differences between the Kinyarwanda and English versions of section 12. The Committee once again refers to paragraphs 672–679 of its General Survey of 2012 on the fundamental Conventions explaining the meaning of the concept of “work of equal value” which not only covers “equal”, the “same” or “similar” work but also addresses situations where men and women perform different work that is nevertheless of equal value. Noting that no progress has been made in this respect for a number of years, the Committee urges the Government to take the necessary steps without delay to amend Law No. 13/2009 of 27 May 2009 regulating Labour, including sections 1.9 and 12, so as to give full legislative effect to the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value.

The Committee notes with concern that the Government’s report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments initially made in 2014.

Article 1(a) of the Convention. Definition of remuneration. The Committee recalls that the Equality of Opportunity and Treatment in Employment and Occupation Act, 2000, contains no definition of the term “remuneration”. The Committee notes the adoption of the Labour Code (Amendment) Act No. 6 of 2011, which amends section 95 of the Labour Code of 2006 to include the definition of “total remuneration” as “all basic wages which the employee is paid or is entitled to be paid by his or her employer in respect of labour performed or services rendered by him or her for his or her employer during that period of employment”. The Committee notes that section 2 of the Labour Code, continues to exclude overtime payments, commissions, service charges, lodging, holiday pay and other allowances from the definition of wages. The Committee recalls that the Convention sets out a very broad definition of “remuneration” in Article 1(a) which includes not only “the ordinary, basic or minimum wage or salary” but also “any additional emoluments whatsoever payable directly or indirectly, whether in cash or in... kind, by the employer to the worker and arising out of the worker’s employment” (see 2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, paragraph 686). The Committee asks the Government to take the necessary measures to further amend section 95 of the Labour Code in order to ensure that at least for the purposes of the application of the principle of the Convention the concept of remuneration covers not only the basic wages, but also any additional benefit or allowance arising out of the worker’s employment.

Different wages and benefits for women and men. The Committee notes with regret that despite the Government’s previous announcement in this respect, the Labour Code (Amendment) Act No. 6 of 2011 does not repeal the existing laws and regulations establishing differential wage rates for men and women, nor does it revoke the Contract of Service Act which provides for different ages for men and women with respect to entitlement to severance pay. The Committee urges the Government to take measures without delay to ensure that all laws and regulations are repealed which contain differential wages for men and women, as well as the Contract of Service Act, which provides for different ages for men and women with respect to entitlement to severance pay. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on any development in this regard.

Article 1 of the Convention. Work of equal value. The Committee notes with regret the Government’s indication that there has been no progress regarding the matter of amending section 3(1) of the Equal Pay Act of 1994, which provides for “equal pay for equal work” and is therefore not in conformity with the principle of equal remuneration for women and men for work of equal value. The Committee requests the Government once again to take steps to amend section 3(1) of the Equal Pay Act without further delay in order to ensure that the legislation provides for equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value, as specified in the Convention; and to provide information on any progress achieved in this regard.

Senegal

Article 1 of the Convention. Legislation. Protection of workers against discrimination. In its previous comments, the Committee emphasized that the Constitution (article 25) and the Labour Code (sections L.1 and L.29) do not cover all the prohibited grounds of discrimination set out in the Convention, as they omit national extraction and colour, and they do not refer explicitly to social origin, and accordingly do not provide protection against discrimination at all stages of employment and occupation. It requested the Government to ensure that the Bill amending the Labour Code explicitly defines and prohibits direct and indirect discrimination on the basis of at least all the grounds listed in Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention and that all stages of employment and occupation are covered. The Committee notes the Government’s indications in its report that the new Bill to amend the Labour Code clearly indicates that “discrimination is understood to mean any distinction, exclusion or preference based, among other grounds, on race, colour, age, sex, trade union activity, belonging to a religion, brotherhood or sect, political opinion, national extraction, ethnicity, social origin, disability, pregnancy, family situation, state of health, serological status, physical appearance, which has the effect of undermining or prejudicing equality of opportunity and treatment in employment and occupation. Discrimination is a practice which is prohibited in all its forms, both directly and indirectly”. The Government adds that the stages of administration and consultation of the social partners have been completed and that it is now for the legislative authority to adopt the Bill. While welcoming this information, the Committee expresses the firm hope that the Bill to amend the provisions of the Labour Code regarding discrimination will be adopted in the near future and requests the Government to continue providing information on the progress made in the legislative work in this regard.

Articles 1(1)(a) and 2. Discrimination based on sex and equality of opportunity and treatment for men and women. The Committee notes that the Government reaffirms its will to continue its efforts to improve the situation of women in employment and occupation, but notes that the report does not contain information on this subject. The Committee notes that, according to the National Survey of Employment in Senegal (second quarter of 2017) undertaken by the National Statistical and Demographic Agency, 39.7 per cent of the employed population was engaged in salaried employment (however, whereas 46.6 per cent of the employed men were engaged in salaried employment, the ratio is only at 30.5 per cent for women), and that unemployment affected women (17.8 per cent) more than men (8.1 per cent). Recalling that, in view of the predominance of women in low-paid work and that a national system of uniform minimum wages contributes to increasing the income of the lowest paid workers, this has an impact on the relationship between the wages of men and those of women and on reducing the remuneration gap between men and women, the Committee welcomes the increase of 44.8 per cent in the minimum wage on 1 June 2018 following an agreement between the trade unions and employers. The Committee further notes that a new National Strategy for Gender Equity and Equality (SNEEG) 2016–26 has been adopted. The SNEEG is targeted particularly at: improving the socio-cultural, political and economic environment through changes in perceptions of gender relations; ensuring the effective implementation of legislative provisions and regulations conducive to equality and equity through the revision and harmonization of the legislation with international conventions and the adoption of additional juridical measures to bring an end to discrimination; and ensuring the equitable access of men and women to economic conditions and opportunities, particularly through an improvement in the access of women to production factors and financial resources, the acquisition by women of technical and managerial capacities and the lightening of the domestic burden on women. The Committee notes that, at the institutional level, the General Secretariat established in ministries by Decree No. 2017-313 of 15 February 2017 includes the bodies and structures responsible for gender and equity and that, within the framework of the SNEEG, ministries are required to establish a “gender unit”. The Committee also notes that, in the report of the United Nations Working Group on the issue of discrimination against women in law and practice on its mission to Senegal (Supplement: comments by the State on the visit of the Working Group to Senegal from 7 to 17 April 2015), the Government states that a technical committee has been established to revise the legislative provisions and regulations which discriminate against women, under the authority of the Minister of Justice, and was established by Order No. 00936 of 27 January 2016 (A/HRC/32/44/Add.3, 13 June 2016, paragraphs 18–22). Welcoming all this information, which demonstrates a firm will to take action against discrimination against women and to promote genuine equality between men and women in employment and occupation, including with regard to access to and retention at school, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the specific measures adopted for the implementation of the SNEEG and their outcome, particularly in relation to the development of vocational guidance and training for women in trades and fields traditionally reserved for men with a view to reducing occupational segregation, combating gender stereotypes and improving the access of women to land, credit and equipment. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the recommendations made by the technical committee for the amendment of legislative provisions and regulations which discriminate against women, and on all the work on the legislation and regulations undertaken in this respect.

Specialized body. The Committee notes that, according to the report of the Working Group referred to above, the Ministry of Labour has prepared a Bill to amend the Labour Code which establishes within the Ministry of Labour a National Observatory responsible for promoting and coordinating policies and programmes to combat discrimination at work and a preliminary text of a Decree issuing the rules on the organization and operation of the Observatory. The Committee notes the Government’s indication in its report that the preparation of the draft Decree has been finalized and that it was approved by the social partners in the National Labour Advisory Council. It notes that the text has not yet been adopted and that its adoption will have to follow that of the envisaged amendment to the Labour Code on this point. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the adoption of the Bill to amend the Labour Code and establish the National Observatory responsible for promoting and coordinating policies and programmes to combat discrimination at work and the Decree establishing the rules for the organization and operation of the Observatory. The Government is requested to provide a copy of these texts.

Practical application. Lack of statistical information. The Committee notes the Government’s repeated indication, in its report, that it is not in a position to provide the statistical information requested by the Committee as such information is not available. The Committee draws the Government’s attention to the importance of collecting and analysing sufficiently detailed statistical information in order to determine and assess the current situation of workers with family responsibilities, design appropriate responses, and monitor and evaluate the impact of the measures which are being implemented. Noting the Government’s indication that a new central statistics system is currently in development with a new methodology for statistics gathering, the Committee trusts that the Government will strengthen its efforts to collect comprehensive and sufficiently detailed data on the issues covered by the Convention. In the meantime, it requests the Government to provide all available information, including statistical data disaggregated by sex, any studies, surveys or reports that may enable the Committee to fully assess how the provisions of the Convention are applied in practice, and its evaluation of how progress is being made to address existing inequalities between men and women workers with family responsibilities and between these workers and workers without such responsibilities.

Articles 4(a) and 7 of the Convention. Measures to promote free choice of employment and integration in the labour market. The Committee notes the Government’s repeated indication that several provisions of the Labour Code and Act No. 5/2004 Coll. on Employment Services are aimed at enabling workers with family responsibilities to exercise their right to free choice of employment and re-enter into the labour market after maternity or parental leave. It notes the Government’s indication that, as a result of the “Work and Family” project, new jobs will be created for which only persons with children below 6 years of age can be hired. The Government indicates that it will cover up to 90 per cent of real expenses to employers in such cases, and up to 50 per cent of real expenses to employers employing persons with children aged between 6 and 10 years of age. With regard to the number of men and women with family responsibilities participating in the National Programme of Education and Preparation for the Labour Market, and the number of whom subsequently entered into the labour market, the Committee notes the Government’s statement that this information is not available. The Committee however notes with concern that, in the framework of the National Employment Strategy until 2020, the Government acknowledged that the presence of children younger than 6 years of age in the family significantly reduces the employment rate of women (less than 40 per cent), while male employment increases (more than 83 per cent). It further notes that, in its concluding observations, the United Nations Committee of the Elimination of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW) expressed concern at the deeply rooted stereotypes regarding women and men in the family, with women continuing to bear a disproportionate share of family responsibilities, and at the lack of effective measures to promote the reconciliation of work and family life which constitutes a barrier to women’s access to employment, in particular for mothers with young children (CEDAW/C/SVK/CO/5-6, 25 November 2015, paragraphs 18 and 28).

Referring to its last comments on the application of the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111), where it highlighted the unbalanced share of family responsibilities and childcare between men and women, the Committee requests the Government to intensify its efforts to overcome the persistent obstacles faced by workers with family responsibilities, and more particularly by mothers with young children, in exercising their right to free choice of employment and entering or re-entering into the labour market and participating in vocational training. It requests the Government to provide information on the concrete measures taken to this end, including in the framework of the “Work and Family” project, and the results achieved in this regard, while specifying the number of women and men with children below 6 years of age and with children between 6 and 10 years of age who have received employment or other benefits under these measures. The Committee once again requests the Government to provide a copy of any collective agreements containing specific provisions in favour of workers with family responsibilities.

Article 6. Educational programmes. The Committee notes the Government’s indication that, as a result of the “Work and Family” project, several media information campaigns were implemented to raise awareness about the objectives of the project. It also takes note of the annual nationwide competition “Family Friendly Employer” organized by the Government which aims to raise public awareness about good practices for better conciliating work and family life. The Government adds that at a more local level, measures are implemented by individual municipalities and self-governing regions to help employers introducing additional measures to support reconciliation of work and family life. While welcoming these initiatives, the Committee notes that, in its concluding observations, the CEDAW expressed concern at the vigorous campaigns by non-State actors, including religious and civic organizations, the media and politicians, advocating traditional family values, overemphasizing the roles of women as mothers and caretakers and criticizing gender equality as “gender ideology” (CEDAW/C/SVK/CO/5-6, paragraph 18). The Committee requests the Government to strengthen its efforts to take effective and proactive measures, such as public awareness-raising campaigns and education initiatives, to promote a more equitable sharing of family responsibilities between men and women, as well as a broader public understanding of various aspects of employment of workers with family responsibilities. It requests the Government to continue to provide information on any survey, studies or programmes undertaken to this end, as well as specific information on the impact of such initiatives and any follow-up measures implemented.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Spain

The Committee notes the observations of the Trade Union Confederation of Workers’ Commissions (CCOO), received on 11 August 2017, and of the General Union of Workers (UGT), received on 17 August 2017, both also transmitted by the Government, and the Government’s responses. The Committee also notes the observations of the International Organisation of Employers (IOE), received on 1 September 2017, which support and endorse the observations of the Spanish Confederation of Employers’ Organizations (CEOE), communicated by the Government, and the Government’s corresponding response.

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Gender wage gap. In its previous observation, the Committee requested the Government to take specific measures for the adoption of effective action to address the gender wage gap, and also to take measures in the area of education and vocational training to address the significant occupational segregation and to enable women to have greater access to non-traditional careers and positions of responsibility, and to provide information on this subject. The Committee notes that the Government’s report contains information on the various measures adopted to promote the principle of the Convention in enterprises, including information on the implementation of the “Equality in the Enterprise” label, subsidies for the development and implementation of equality plans in enterprises, and the advisory services, awareness-raising training and citizens’ information for the development of equality plans managed by the Women’s Institute for Equality of Opportunities which, among other measures, makes available to enterprises self-diagnosis tools for the gender wage gap and for the assessment of jobs from a gender perspective. The Committee also notes the collaboration agreement between the Ministry of Employment and Social Security and the Ministry of Health, Social Services and Equality for permanent monitoring in enterprises of effective equality between men and women and the results of the campaigns on gender-based wage discrimination. With regard to vertical occupational segregation, the Committee notes the extensive information provided by the Government on the various programmes undertaken in collaboration with enterprises with a view to promoting the access of women to decision-making positions, including the More Women, Better Enterprises (Más Mujeres, Mejores Empresas) programme, the Promotion Project, the Programme for the Development of Women Directors and the Women’s Entrepreneurship and Leadership Development Project in decision-making bodies in enterprises in the agro-food sector. With regard to horizontal segregation, the Government indicates that, in recent years, significant progress has been made in equality in education and training, but that important objectives still need to be addressed, especially in the fields of sciences, technology, engineering and mathematics. With a view to eliminating the “scientific gap”, the Government refers to the Digital Agenda for Spain 2013 and the Plan for Equality of Opportunities for Women and Men in the Information Society 2014–17, in the context of which awareness-raising and training campaigns have been undertaken to promote the capacities of women in information and communication technologies, together with action to promote and support women’s entrepreneurship through these technologies.

On the other hand, the Committee notes the Annual Wage Structure Survey published in 2018, according to which:
(i) the annual wage of women in 2016 represented 77.7 per cent of that of men; (ii) the economic activities with the best annual wages were found in electrical energy, gas, steam and air conditioning, financing and insurance, information and communications, while the lowest annual salaries were in catering and other services; and (iii) with regard to wages by occupation, the lowest paid occupations were occupied by unskilled workers in services (with the exception of transport), workers in the catering services and commerce, and workers in health and personal care services, where the average wages were all below the national average. In this regard, the Committee also notes the report “The situation of women on the labour market 2017”, available on the website of the Ministry of Employment and Social Security, according to which almost 89 per cent of women in employment are engaged in the services sector.

The Committee notes that, according to the UGT, the measures adopted by the Government are ineffective and inadequate to achieve wage equality between men and women. The UGT indicates that it has communicated to the Government the need to develop and adopt legislation on gender wage equality in order to make progress. It adds that, in the current context of a more precarious labour market, enterprise equality plans are not effective in achieving wage equality between men and women workers, very few plans are negotiated in practice with workers’ representatives and almost none of them contain measures to achieve wage equality. The Committee further notes the indication by the CCOO that the measures to which the Government refers, such as More Women, Better Enterprises, the Promotion Project, the Programme for the Development of Women Directors, are intended for women who are in managerial positions or on executive boards, and it is necessary to take measures which are also intended for women at lower wage levels. In this regard, the CCOO indicates that women represent 70 per cent of the employed population with incomes below the minimum wage (SMI). The Committee also notes the observations of the CEOE, which update the Government’s report on various points, and particularly on the implementation of the Promotion Project.

The Committee notes the Government’s reply to the observations made by the UGT and the CCOO, in which it: (i) indicates that the underlying causes of the gender wage gap are numerous and complex; (ii) indicates that the development of new measures is being examined to address wage inequality based on certain projects undertaken in 2014 and 2015 in collaboration with universities, trade unions and employers’ organizations; (iii) recalls that enterprises with over 250 workers are required by law to negotiate and implement an equality plan and that enterprises which voluntarily implement equality plans have to ensure the participation of the legal representatives of the staff in their preparation and implementation; (iv) emphasizes that the conditions for the subsidies for equality plans referred to above provide that the plans to be financed shall promote specific measures in a series of areas, including access to employment and conditions of work, intended to combat horizontal and vertical gender segregation and achieve equal remuneration, and recalls the diagnostic tools for the wage gap and other instruments made available in enterprises; (v) reiterates that Spanish labour legislation already sets out and guarantees equality in employment, including in relation to remuneration, in full recognition of the principle of the Convention; (vi) adds that Act 3 of 2012 on urgent measures for labour market reform removed occupational categories from the system of the occupational classification of workers on the grounds that in many cases the categories were indirectly responsible for wage discrimination against women, and provided that the definition of occupational groups shall be adjusted to criteria and systems which have the objective of ensuring the absence of direct and indirect discrimination between men and women (section 22(3)); and (vii) recognizes that the wage gap continues to be a serious problem which requires the adoption of additional measures for its reduction and emphasizes the importance of collective bargaining for this purpose. The Committee requests the Government to continue its efforts to reduce the gender wage gap, in collaboration with workers’ and employers’ organizations, and to monitor the impact of the measures adopted with a view to identifying and adopting the necessary adjustments. The Committee also requests the Government to: (i) continue providing information on the measures adopted or envisaged, including any measure to promote and provide training on the principle of the Convention and on the self-diagnosis tool for the gender wage gap and for the evaluation of jobs from a gender perspective made available to enterprises by the Women’s Institute for Equality of Opportunities; and (ii) to provide information on any measures adopted to address the underlying causes of the wage gap. Please also provide statistical information disaggregated by sex on the participation of men and women in the labour market (with an indication of the sectors in which they are engaged and their wage levels), in education and vocational training.
Labour inspection. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to continue providing information on the measures adopted and the investigations carried out by the labour inspection services, particularly on the action taken under Instruction No. 3/2011 on the monitoring in enterprises of effective equality between men and women. The Committee notes the information provided by the Government on the results of the specific campaigns undertaken by the labour inspection services on gender wage discrimination in 2014, 2015 and 2016 in 446, 414 and 408 enterprises, respectively, throughout the country. The Committee notes that in 2014 gender wage discrimination was detected in four enterprises, as well as the same number of enterprises in 2015 and two enterprises in 2016. The Committee also notes that, according to the CCOO, the action taken by the labour inspection services is inadequate and, although the tool to detect the existence of wage gaps marks progress, there is no record of the number of enterprises which have used it and whether, in the event that a wage gap is detected, it has been corrected. The Committee notes that, in its response to the observations of the CCOO, the Government indicates that a central feature of the action taken by the labour inspection services is that concerning the application of the principle of the Convention which goes beyond the specific campaigns, and which supplements but does not account for the totality of the activities undertaken by the labour inspection system in relation to wage equality for men and women. The Government adds data on the activities of the labour inspection services undertaken in relation to gender equality. The Committee requests the Government to continue providing information on the measures adopted and the investigations carried out by the labour inspection services in relation to equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value. Recalling the persistence of a substantial gender wage gap and the fact that 89 per cent of women in employment are in the low-wage services sector, the Committee requests the Government to indicate specific measures undertaken or contemplated by labour inspection services to improve enforcement of national laws related to effective implementation of the Convention.

The Committee notes the observations of the Trade Union Confederation of Workers’ Commissions (CCOO), received on 11 August 2017, and of the General Union of Workers (UGT), received on 17 August 2017, both also transmitted by the Government, and the Government’s corresponding responses. The Committee also notes the observations of the International Organisation of Employers (IOE), received on 1 September 2017, which support and endorse the observations of the Spanish Confederation of Employers’ Organizations (CEOE), transmitted by the Government, and the Government’s response. The Committee notes that in its observations the CEOE makes comments of a fundamentally linguistic and terminological nature which have been included by the Government in its report.

Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention. Discrimination based on race, colour, religion and national extraction. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to ensure that the necessary resources were allocated for the implementation of the action and measures envisaged under the Strategic Plan for Citizenship and Integration (PECI) 2011–14, particularly within the framework of the comprehensive strategy to combat racism, racial discrimination, xenophobia and other forms of intolerance. It also requested the Government to: (i) assess the impact of such action and measures addressing discrimination in employment and occupation against men and women on grounds of race, colour, religion and national extraction, particularly in relation to the situation of migrant workers and the Roma; and (ii) to provide information on the mapping of discrimination in Spain, which involved undertaking perception surveys and the systematic compilation of empirical and official data on complaints, violations, penalties and offences related to discrimination, and the measures adopted as a result, the obstacles and difficulties encountered. The Committee notes the Government’s indication in its report that, in the context of the project “Map of Discrimination in Spain”, a comprehensive survey was undertaken for the first time of perceptions of discrimination in the country in 2013, and was replicated in 2016. The Government indicates that various types of measures have been adopted based on the conclusions of these surveys and that progress is being made in the systematic compilation of empirical and official data on complaints, violations, penalties and offences related to discrimination. The Committee also notes the Government’s indication concerning the publication of guides on “How to act in cases of discrimination, hate crime and intolerance” intended for citizens in general and technical personnel in social institutions and non-governmental organizations, and the various training programmes on equality and non-discrimination intended for public employees and lawyers.

The Committee notes the UGT’s indication in its observations that there is no specific budgetary allocation for the PECI and that the budget allocated for the integration of foreign nationals has been falling since 2012. The UGT adds that, although the PECI envisaged an intermediary evaluation, an external evaluation during its final stage and a final evaluation, these evaluations have not been undertaken. The UGT further adds that the Government has not indicated any intention to engage in the development of a third phase of the PECI.

The Committee also notes the reform prepared by the Spanish Observatory of Racism and Xenophobia on the “Integration of the children of immigrants in the labour market”, which finds, on the one hand, that the educational levels of the native population are significantly higher than those of the children of immigrants (61 per cent compared with 37 per cent with higher vocational training or university studies) and, on the other hand, that the existing differences in educational levels do not adequately explain the differences in the types of work obtained by the various groups, which would appear to suggest the existence of a certain level of discrimination in enterprises when selecting and recruiting young persons of foreign origin for the various types of job. The report suggests certain approaches in this regard, including the provision to young persons of permanent support and guidance services for their vocational careers and awareness-raising activities for enterprises on discrimination with a view to encouraging them to adopt mechanisms which prevent the risk of racist or xenophobic views entering into selection processes.

The Committee also notes the report “Evolution of discrimination in Spain”, dated 24 August 2018, of the Ministry of Health, Social Services and Equality, which analyses discrimination in the country on the basis of the surveys carried out in 2013 and 2016, referred to above, and brings to light the following aspects: (i) in terms of perceived discrimination, in the working environment, greater discrimination was perceived in 2016 in selection for employment positions, and particularly in access to positions of responsibility; (ii) the gypsy population still perceives itself as the group most affected by discrimination in access to employment; and (iii) in general, discrimination on ethnic or racial grounds continues to be the most widely perceived form of discrimination.

The Committee also notes the Operational Plan 2018–20 of the National Strategy for the Social Inclusion of the Gypsy Population 2012–20, available on the website of the Ministry of Health, Consumption and Social Welfare, which includes among its objectives improving the access to employment and reducing precarious work among the gypsy population and improving their vocational skills. The Committee notes that, according to the Operational Plan, the action to be taken in the next few years will be intended to: (i) promote greater participation by young and adult gypsies in employment and employability programmes; (ii) supplement employment and employability programmes for the population as a whole with specific programmes in coordination with associations representing gypsies; and (iii) make progress to improve coordination between the social services and employment services. The Committee encourages the Government to continue monitoring the evolution of discrimination in employment and occupation based on race, colour, religion and national extraction throughout the country, in collaboration with workers’ and employers’ organizations. It requests the Government to provide information on the measures adopted or envisaged as a result of the diagnostic studies undertaken, particularly in relation to the children of immigrants, migrant workers, including migrant domestic workers, the Roma, and on the measures adopted in the context of the National Strategy for the Social Inclusion of the Gypsy Population 2012–20 and their results. The Committee also requests the Government to assess the impact of the action and measures taken to address discrimination in employment and occupation based on race, colour, religion and national extraction, and to provide information on this subject.

Article 2. Equality of opportunity between men and women. In its previous observation, the Committee requested the Government to continue taking proactive measures with a view to increasing the number of enterprises adopting equality plans and to indicate whether these plans are the outcome of collective bargaining. The Committee also requested the Government to provide information on the measures adopted within the framework of the Strategic Plan for Equality of Opportunity (PEIO) 2014–16 and the Special Plan for Equality for Women and Men in the World of Work and against Wage Discrimination 2014–16, as well as on the manner in which such measures are adjusted to the present crisis situation and the impact of such measures on the promotion of equality between men and women. It further requested information on the outcome of the evaluation of the Basic Act on effective equality for women and men of 22 March 2007 (No. 3/2007). The Committee notes that the Government has provided information on calls for subsidies for the development of equality plans, through which financing was provided to 273 projects during the period 2014–16, as well as on the advisory services, awareness raising, training and citizens’ information provided for the development of enterprise equality plans, which were managed by the Women’s Institute for Equality of Opportunities (IMIO). With regard to the participation of the social partners in the preparation of these plans, the Government recalls that, under the terms of section 45(5) of Basic Act No. 3/2007, “the development and implementation of equality plans is voluntary [for enterprises with fewer than 250 workers], based on prior consultation with the legal representatives of men and women workers”. In the case of enterprises with over 250 workers, such plans have to be the subject of negotiation. The Government adds that it will provide information on the findings of the evaluation of the PEIO 2014–16 when they are available. The Committee further notes the Government’s indication that the Special Plan for Equality for Women and Men in the World of Work and against Wage Discrimination 2014–16 was not approved. With reference to the evaluation of the Basic Act No. 3/2007, the Committee notes the Government’s indication that a periodic report 2012–13 was prepared, as well as a report on the principal activities 2014–15, which show that the socio-labour situation of women is improving slowly and that higher levels of equality are being achieved in almost all areas, although there continue to be obstacles and resistance to such changes.

The Committee also notes that, according to the CCOO, despite the fact that a significant number of equality plans have been negotiated and concluded in recent years, there are still many enterprises in which the process has not been commenced. The CCOO indicates that it is difficult to know precisely the number of equality plans which have so far been signed or are under negotiation. It adds that there is resistance by enterprises to the provision of data, and particularly wage data, as a basis for assessing the situation prior to the preparation of an equality plan. The Committee further notes that, according to the CCOO, very few agreements contain affirmative action measures in relation to the recruitment and promotion of personnel. The CCOO refers to the practice identified in certain agreements of indicating that “in the event of equal skills and capacities, the person with the greatest seniority in the enterprise shall be chosen”, which benefits men, as women have tended to enter the labour market later, and also have career interruptions due to their care work. With reference to the PEIO 2014–16, the CCOO indicates that the envisaged measures are generic and imprecise and that no information has been provided on the preparation of a new plan. The CCOO recalls that the fifth final provision of the Basic Act No. 3/2007 provides that “the Government shall undertake an evaluation, with the most representative unions and employers’ associations, of the situation of collective bargaining in relation to equality, and shall examine, on the basis of the changes noted, the measures which may be appropriate”. The CCOO indicates in this respect that a report on the impact of the Act was commissioned from a university, which may be considered as a replacement for the evaluation required by the Act in the above provision. The Committee notes that in its response to the CCOO’s observations, the Government indicates that: (i) the PEIO has been implemented through specific plans, namely the Plan of Action for Equality between Men and Women in the Information Society, approved in 2014, and the Plan for the Promotion of Women in Rural Areas, approved in 2015; and (ii) the IMIO is preparing the basic priorities of a new Strategic Plan for Equality of Opportunity. With reference to the issues of occupational segregation and equality of remuneration between men and women, the Committee refers to its comments under the Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100). The Committee recalls the important role played by workers’ and employers’ organizations in developing and promoting the acceptance and observance of national policies and plans, as well as in evaluating their impact. The cooperation and consultation process provided for in the Convention assist in ensuring that the measures enjoy wide support and that policies are effectively implemented (2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, paragraph 858). The Committee requests the Government to continue adopting proactive measures, in collaboration with the social partners, with a view to increasing the number of enterprises which adopt equality plans. The Committee also requests the Government to provide information on the findings of the evaluation of the PEIO 2014–16 and on any other measure envisaged or adopted under the PEIO with a view to promoting and guaranteeing equality of opportunity and treatment for men and women in the public and private sectors. Please also provide information on the application and impact of the new Strategic Plan for Equality of Opportunity.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Sri Lanka

Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100) (ratification: 1993)

Article 1 of the Convention. Work of equal value. Legislation. The Committee previously expressed concern at the absence of legislation providing for equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value, as well as at the limitations of the principle of equal wages for the “same” or “substantially the same” work, arising out of wage ordinances and collective agreements. The Committee notes the Government’s repeated indication, in its report, that while no legislative provision explicitly prohibits discrimination in employment, wage ordinances and collective agreements do not contain discriminatory provisions in determining wages. While noting that the Policy Framework and National Plan of Action to address Sexual and Gender-based Violence for 2016–20, elaborated with the assistance of the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP), set as an objective to ensure equal remuneration for “similar work”, the Committee again draws the Government’s attention to the fact that the concept of “work of equal value”, which lies at the heart of the fundamental right of equal remuneration for men and women for equal value, goes beyond equal remuneration for “equal”, “the same” or “similar” work, and also encompasses work that is of an entirely different nature, but which is nevertheless of equal value. It further recalls that when collective agreements or wage ordinances do not explicitly provide for different remuneration rates for men and women or when they only prohibit sex-based wage discrimination generally, this will not normally be sufficient to give effect to the Convention, as it does not fully capture the concept of “work of equal value” set out in the Convention (see 2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, paragraphs 673 and 676). Regrett ing that unlike the previous National Action Plan for the Protection and Promotion of Human Rights, the new Human Rights Action Plan for 2017–21 does not include “equal pay for work of equal value” as an explicit objective anymore, the Committee again urges the Government to take all the necessary steps to give full legislative expression to the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value, and to provide information on any concrete steps taken in this regard.

Articles 1 and 2. Assessment of the gender pay gap. Noting that the Government only refers to the statistical information forwarded, the Committee draws the Government’s attention to the fact that the information provided does not enable the Committee to assess the application of the principle of the Convention in practice. The Committee notes that women represented only 37.3 per cent of the economically active population in 2017 (against 62.7 per cent for men) and that despite steady economic growth, the employment rate of women remained low at 36 per cent in 2017 (against 41 per cent in 2010), with more than one third of working women employed in the informal economy, characterized by low wages. It notes with concern that, according to the “Survey on hours actually worked and average earnings” published by the Statistics Division of the Department of Labour in 2016, the average earnings of women are lower than those of men in almost all economic sectors, even when men and women workers are employed in the same occupational category. The Committee further notes that, in its last concluding observations, the United Nations Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights (CESCR) expressed concern about the historically low participation of women in the labour market, and that women tend to be employed in low-paying jobs in tea plantations and the garment sector. It recommended that the Government take steps to effectively address sociocultural barriers that may have a negative impact on women’s opportunities for employment, particularly in sectors with high wage levels (E/C.12/LKA/CO/5, 4 August 2017, paragraphs 25 and 26). The Committee also notes that, in its concluding observations, the United Nations Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW) expressed concern at the wide gender wage gap, the limited implementation and monitoring of the principle of equal pay for work of equal value and the concentration of women in the informal employment sector (CEDAW/C/LKA/CO/8, 3 March 2017, paragraph 32). Taking into consideration the wide gender pay gap and the persistent gender segregation in the labour market, the Committee requests the Government to strengthen its efforts to take more proactive measures, including with employers and workers’ organizations, to raise awareness, make assessments, and promote and enforce the application of the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value, as enshrined in the Convention. It requests the Government to provide information on the specific measures taken to address the gender remuneration gap by identifying and addressing the underlying causes of pay differentials such as vertical and horizontal job segregation and gender stereotypes, covering both the formal and informal economy, and by promoting women’s access to a wider range of jobs with career prospects and higher pay. Recalling that collecting, analysing and disseminating information is important in identifying and addressing inequality in remuneration, it requests the Government to provide updated statistical information on the average level of earnings of men and women, disaggregated by economic activity and occupation, both in the private and public sectors, as well as in the informal economy.

Article 2. Minimum wages. Wages boards. Referring to its previous comments, the Committee notes the Government’s statement that sex-specific terminology is no longer used in the wages board’s decisions. Regarding the Government’s earlier request for ILO technical assistance for the simplification of the wages boards system, the Committee notes that, in light of the future adoption of the Single Employment Law to replace the Wages Board Ordinance, the Shop and Office Employees Act, the Employment of Women, Young Persons and Children Act and the Maternity Benefits Ordinance – without prejudice to the labour rights guaranteed at present by labour laws – this request is now redundant. The Committee welcomes the adoption of the National Minimum Wage Act No. 3 of 2016 which sets a national minimum wage, but notes that, in its concluding observations, the CESCR expressed concern about the fact that the Act does not cover workers in the informal economy, those not unionized, those on daily wages (for example plantation workers) and domestic workers (E/C.12/LKA/CO/5, 4 August 2017, paragraph 31). Recalling that the setting of minimum wages can make an important contribution to the application of the principle of the Convention which applies to all workers, in all sectors, both in the formal and informal economy, and noting that according to the National Action Plan for the Protection and Promotion of Human Rights 2017–21 the Government will consider the ratification of the Domestic Workers Convention, 2011 (No. 189), the Committee requests the Government to indicate how equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value is also ensured for workers who are not covered by the National Minimum Wage Act, including workers in the informal economy, those not unionized, those on daily wages such as plantation workers, as well as domestic workers, which are sectors characterized by a high proportion of women and particularly low wages. It also requests the Government to provide information on the progress made in simplifying the wages boards system, as well as on the measures taken to ensure that the rates of wages fixed by the wages boards are based on objective criteria free from gender bias (such as qualifications, effort, responsibilities and conditions of work), so that work predominantly done by women, as well as skills considered to be “female” (such as, for example, manual dexterity and those required in the caring professions) are not undervalued or even overlooked, compared to work predominantly done by men or skills traditionally considered to be “male” skills (such as heavy lifting).

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Article 1 of the Convention. Legislative protection against discrimination. For a number of years, the Committee has been urging the Government to introduce provisions into its national legislation ensuring that all men and women, citizens and non-citizens, are effectively protected from discrimination in all aspects of employment and occupation on all the grounds enumerated in Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention. It previously drew the Government’s attention to the fact that articles 12, 14 and 17 of the Constitution addressing discrimination appear to cover citizens only and do not prohibit discrimination on the grounds of colour or national extraction. The Committee welcomes the Government’s statement, in its report, that it will discuss this matter with all relevant stakeholders exploring the possibility of amending the existing labour legislation or adopting new legislation to address discrimination in employment. The Committee notes that the National Action Plan for the Protection and Promotion of Human Rights for 2017–21 sets, as an explicit objective, the enactment legislation to guarantee the right to non-discrimination on any prohibited ground, including sex, race, ethnicity, religion, caste, place of origin, gender identity, disability or any other status in all workplaces, including in the private sector. However it draws the Government’s attention to the fact that the Action Plan does not refer to the grounds of “colour”, “political opinion”, “national extraction” and “social origin” which are enumerated in Article 1(1)(a). The Committee notes that, in their concluding observations, several United Nations treaty bodies (Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights; Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women; Committee on Migrant Workers; Committee on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination) also expressed concern about the national legislation which does not prohibit discrimination on the grounds of colour or national extraction and does not specifically prohibits both direct and indirect forms of discrimination (E/C.12/LKA/CO/5, 4 August 2017, paragraph 13; CEDAW/C/LKA/CO/8, 3 March 2017, paragraph 10; CMW/C/LKA/CO/2, 11 October 2016, paragraph 26; and CERD/C/LKA/CO/10-17, 6 October 2016, paragraph 8). In that regard, the Committee recalls that clear and comprehensive definitions of what constitute discrimination in employment and occupation are instrumental in identifying and addressing the many manifestations in which it may occur (see the 2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, paragraph 743). The Committee urges the Government to take all the necessary steps to introduce specific legislative provisions in order to ensure that all men and women, citizens and non-citizens, are effectively protected from both direct and indirect discrimination in all aspects of employment and occupation and on all the grounds enumerated in the Convention, including colour and national extraction. It requests the Government to provide information on any progress made in this regard. The Committee again requests the Government to provide information on the number and nature of employment discrimination cases that have been handled by the Supreme Court pursuant to articles 12(1) and 17 of the Constitution, and their outcome, as well as copies of any relevant judicial decisions.

Article 1(1)(a). Discrimination based on sex. Sexual harassment. While welcoming the voluntary Code of Conduct and Guidelines to Prevent and Address Sexual Harassment in Workplaces developed in 2013 by the Employers’ Federation of Ceylon, in collaboration with the ILO, the Committee previously raised concerns regarding the absence of effective protection of workers against sexual harassment in employment and occupation. It notes the Government’s indication that articles 11 and 12 of the Constitution, on freedom from torture and right to equality respectively, can serve as a legal basis for victims of sexual harassment, and that courts have considered demands for sexual favours for job promotion as a “bribe” punishable under the Bribery Act, 1980. While noting that these general provisions do not explicitly refer to “sexual harassment”, the Committee notes that the Government again refers to section 345 of the Penal Code covering sexual harassment, without providing the requested information in order to clarify the scope of the provision regarding the interpretation of the expression “a person in authority”. The Committee welcomes the inclusion in the National Action Plan for the Protection and Promotion of Human Rights for 2017–21 of proposed legislation to specifically deal with sexual harassment in the workplace both in the public and private sectors. The Committee also welcomes the plan to take steps to ensure that employers both in the public and private sectors introduce mandatory guidelines and appoint committees to respond to sexual harassment, in consultation with employers’ and workers’ organizations. It notes that the Policy Framework and National Plan of Action to address Sexual and Gender-based Violence for 2016–20, developed with the assistance of the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP), which highlights that women working in Export Processing Zones (EPZs) are particularly exposed to sexual harassment, also provides for the promotion of a policy to address sexual harassment in workplaces and implementing mechanisms to address sexual harassment in the private sector. However, the Committee notes that in its concluding observations the United Nations Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW) expressed concern at the high levels of gender-based violence against women, with cases of violence against women being underreported due to a lack of adequate legislation, women’s limited access to justice for reasons including fear of reprisals, limited trust in the police and judiciary, extreme delays in the investigation and adjudication of such cases, arbitrary outcomes, and very low conviction rates. The CEDAW also expressed concern at the lack of disaggregated data on sexual harassment in the workplace and on measures taken to address such cases (CEDAW/C/LKA/CO8, 3 March 2017, paragraphs 22 and 32). Referring to the National Action Plan for the Protection and Promotion of Human Rights for 2017–21, the Committee urges the Government to take the necessary steps to include specific legislative provisions that clearly define and prohibit all forms of sexual harassment in the workplace, both quid pro quo and hostile environment harassment, and requests the Government to provide information on any progress made in this regard. It again requests the Government to provide information on any progress made in this regard, as well as copies of any relevant judicial decisions.

Referring to the National Action Plan for the Protection and Promotion of Human Rights for 2017–21 and the National Plan of Action to address Sexual and Gender-based Violence for 2016–20. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken to promote women’s access to justice, including by ensuring that they have a better knowledge of their rights and of the legal procedures available, as well as the number of complaints concerning sexual harassment in the workplace lodged, penalties imposed and compensation awarded, including in the context of unjustified termination.

Article 2. Equality of opportunity and treatment between men and women. Referring to its previous comments, the Committee notes the Government’s statement that the Women’s Rights Bill was renamed Women’s Commission Bill and the draft bill was prepared in 2017 and awaiting Attorney General’s certificate on constitutionality. The Committee takes note of the Local Authorities Elections (Amendment) Act No. 1 of 2016 which includes a 25 per cent quota for women in local public bodies, but notes that, in its concluding observations, the United Nations Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights (CESCR) indicated that despite this new legislation, the participation of women in political and public life and in decision-making remains very low (E/C.12/LKA/CO/5, 4 August 2017, paragraph 23). The Committee notes that, in 2017, women represented only 37.3 per cent of the economically active population (against 62.7 per cent for men) and that despite steady economic growth, the employment rate of women remained low at 36 per cent (against 41 per cent in 2010). It notes, from the 2016 Annual Employment Survey that there is both vertical and horizontal occupational gender segregation, with women being concentrated in the agriculture, manufacturing and education sectors, as well as in elementary occupations (28.5 per cent) and clerical support (13 per cent), while only few women are employed in managerial and senior official positions (3.3 per cent) or as technical and associate professionals (4.5 per cent).
cent). It notes in particular that, in its last concluding observations, the United Nations Committee on Migrant Workers (CMW) highlighted that women in Sri Lanka continue to be compelled to become domestic migrant workers owing to the lack of equal access to employment (CMW/C/LKA/CO/2, 11 October 2016, paragraph 52). The Committee welcomes the measures included in the National Action Plan for the Protection and Promotion of Human Rights for 2017–21 which aims to increase the participation of women in employment both in the public and private sectors, including by training women for higher skilled occupations in the formal and non-traditional areas, as well as closing the gender gap in the formal sector by providing childcare facilities, encouraging more flexible work arrangements and promoting men’s roles and responsibilities in childcare and family duties. The Committee requests the Government to provide detailed information on any policy and measures adopted, in the framework of the National Action Plan for the Protection and Promotion of Human Rights for 2017–21 or otherwise, to enhance women’s access to employment and to a wider range of jobs and higher level positions, including through measures aimed at combating stereotypes regarding women’s capabilities and role in the society and better reconciling work and family responsibilities. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the status of the adoption of the Women’s Commission Bill, as well as a copy of the new legislation once adopted. It requests the Government to provide updated statistical information on the participation of men and women in education, training and employment, both in the public and private sectors, including in the informal economy, disaggregated by occupational categories and positions, as well as on the number of women in Sri Lanka employed as domestic migrant workers (including domestic migrant workers).

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Tajikistan

Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100) (ratification: 1993)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government’s report once again contains no information in response to a number of its previous comments. The Committee wishes to reiterate that without the necessary information, it is not in a position to assess the effective implementation of the Convention, including any progress achieved since its ratification. The Committee hopes that the next report will contain full information on the issues raised below.

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Gender wage gap. Private sector. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the persistence of both the gender wage gap and occupational gender segregation. It also noted that agricultural workers were still paid the lowest wage in the economy (367.59 Tajikistani Somoni (TJS) for men and TJS211.34 for women, approximately US$39 and $22 respectively) and that women were concentrated in the informal economy and in low-paid jobs. The Committee therefore requested that the Government step up its efforts to address the gender wage gap, particularly in the agricultural sector, and that it provide information on the measures taken in this regard. It also requested that the Government provide information on the measures taken to improve access of women to a wider range of job opportunities at all levels to address the occupational gender segregation. The Committee notes, from the Government’s report, the adoption of a national strategy to enhance the role of women and girls 2011–20 and a state programme on the education, selection and appointment of managerial positions in the Republic of Tajikistan from among capable women and girls 2007–16. With regard to the fact that workers with the lowest paid jobs are found in the agricultural sector, the Government indicates that trade unions intend to make proposals to amend the General Agreement for the period 2018–20. The Government also indicates, in its report on the application of the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111), that as a result of the state programme, in 2017, 1,002 women in need of special social protection were provided with employment and that 528 entrepreneurial initiatives from women received financial assistance. Further, the Committee notes, from the Government’s sixth periodic report submitted under the United Nations Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW), the establishment of presidential grants to support and develop women’s entrepreneurial activities in 2016–20, the Plan of Action of the National Strategy on promoting the role of women 2015–20 and the National Development Strategy of the Republic of Tajikistan for the period up to 2030, which includes a special section addressing existing problems of inequality and discrimination, particularly for women in rural areas, and ways of resolving them (CEDAW/C/TJK/6, 2 November 2017, paragraph 136). The Committee requests the Government to provide detailed information on the measures taken in the framework of the abovementioned policies to improve the access of women, especially women in rural areas, to job opportunities at all levels, including as managers of farms, and on the impact of such measures. The Committee further requests the Government to pursue its efforts to address the gender wage gap, particularly in the agricultural sector, and to provide information on the measures taken in this regard and the results obtained with regard to achieving pay equity. Finally, noting the absence of information provided in this regard, the Committee once again requests the Government to provide detailed and up-to-date statistics on wages of women and men, including sex disaggregated data by industry and occupational category.

Civil service. In the absence of any information provided in this regard, the Committee once again requests the Government to indicate how it ensures equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value in the civil service in practice and to provide statistical information disaggregated by sex on the distribution of men and women in the various occupations and grades in the civil service, and their corresponding earnings.
Article 2. Legislation. In its previous comments, the Committee asked the Government to clarify whether section 102 of the Labour Code and section 13 of the Framework Law on State Guarantees of Equal Rights for Men and Women and Equal Opportunities in the Exercise of such Rights, No. 89 of 1 March 2005, both provided for equal pay for “work of equal value” or for “equal work”. The Committee takes due note that the wording of section 140 of the new Labour Code 2017 and section 13 of the above-mentioned Framework Law of 2005 both guarantee equal remuneration for work of equal value. Noting however that, once again, the report is silent on the application of these provisions in practice, the Committee stresses that the continued persistence of significant gender pay gaps requires that governments, along with employers’ and workers’ organizations take measures to raise awareness, make assessments, and promote and enforce the application of the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value (see 2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, paragraph 669). Consequently, the Committee reiterates its request to the Government that it provide information on the practical application of section 140 of the Labour Code 2017 and section 13 of Framework Law No. 89 of 1 March 2005.

Article 3. Wage determination. The Committee previously noted the adoption of Government Decree No. 98 of 5 March 2008, to approve the concept of wage reforms in the Republic of Tajikistan, which provides, among others, for mechanisms of state regulation of wage determination. In this context, it requested the Government to provide information on the measures taken to ensure that the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value is being taken into account. The Committee notes that the Government has not provided any information in this regard. The Committee therefore once again requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken to ensure that the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value is being taken into account in the context of state regulation of wage determination.

Article 4. Collective agreements. The Committee previously requested the Government to provide examples of collective agreements covering different sectors, to indicate how these agreements promote the principle of equal pay for work of equal value, and to indicate the percentage of the workforce covered by collective agreements. The Committee takes note of the Government’s indication that there are 20 sectorial trade union committees covering all sectors of employment. The Government also indicates that trade union committees work with employers on basic wage agreements and collective agreements. While taking due note of the information provided, the Committee notes that the Government does not indicate how collective agreements promote the principle of the Convention. The Committee therefore once again requests the Government to provide examples of collective agreements covering different sectors and to indicate how these agreements promote the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value. It also requests the Government to indicate the percentage of the workforce covered by collective agreements, disaggregated by sex.

Enforcement. The Committee previously noted that a Coordinating Council on Gender Issues has been established in the Ministry of Labour and Social Protection and the State Labour Inspectorate to monitor discrimination against women in the labour market and requested the Government to provide information on its activities regarding equal remuneration for men and women. The Committee also requested the Government to provide information on cases of violations of the principle of equal remuneration dealt by the labour inspectorate or the courts. The Committee notes the Government’s indication that no complaints regarding remuneration have been recorded. The Committee once again requests the Government to provide information on the activities of the Coordinating Council on Gender Issues to monitor sex-based discrimination regarding remuneration. With regard to the lack of complaints, the Committee refers the Government to its comments under Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) and requests the Government to indicate the measures taken or envisaged to ensure that the principle of the Convention is enforced by the courts and the labour inspectorate. Once again, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the number of violations of section 140 of the Labour Code dealt with by the Ministry of Labour and Social Protection and the State Labour Inspectorate, and indicate whether the courts have dealt with any cases concerning the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value.

Article 2 of the Convention. Equality of opportunity and treatment between men and women. Legislative developments. Noting that the Framework Law on State Guarantees of Equal Rights for Men and Women and Equal Opportunities in the Exercise of such Rights No. 89 of 1 March 2005 (Law on State Guarantees of 2005) contains a number of provisions prohibiting discrimination based on gender in all spheres, including in employment, and promoting the principle of equal opportunities for men and women, the Committee had requested the Government to provide information on its implementation in practice. The Committee notes the Government’s indication, in its report, that the Government Decree No. 608 of December 2006 approved the Regulation on the Committee for Women’s and Family Affairs (CWFA), which is the central authority responsible for the implementation of State policy to protect and provide for the rights and interests of women and families. The Committee notes, however, that the Government does not provide any information on the activities of the CWFA to implement the Law on State Guarantees of 2005. Further, it notes that the Government has not provided any information on the manner in which violations of the Law on State Guarantees of 2005 are dealt with. In that regard, the Committee wishes to stress that legislative measures to give effect to the principles of the Convention are important but not sufficient to achieve its objective and that effectively responding to the complex realities and variety of ways in which discrimination occurs requires the adoption of differentiated measures, such as proactive measures designed to address the underlying causes of discrimination and de facto inequalities resulting from discrimination deeply entrenched in traditional and societal values (see 2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, paragraph 856). The Committee therefore again requests the Government to provide information on the implementation in practice of the Framework Law on State Guarantees of Equal Rights for Men and Women and Equal Opportunities in the Exercise of such Rights, No. 89 of 1 March 2005 (such as for example, through the development of codes, tools and guides or affirmative action measures) including on the manner in which violations of its provisions are being addressed by the CWFA, the labour inspectorate or the courts.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia

The Committee notes that the Government’s report contains no reply to its previous comments. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments initially made in 2015.

Legislative developments. The Committee notes the adoption of the new Law on Equal Opportunities for Women and Men, 2012. In accordance with article 2, this Law aims to establish equal opportunities and equal treatment for men and women in various fields, including the economic, social and education fields and in the public and private sectors. Articles 7 and 8 provide for the adoption of temporary special measures to overcome an existing structural gender inequality, including through positive and promotional measures. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the concrete measures taken for the general implementation of this Law and its impact on the achievement of gender equality in both the public and the private sectors. It also requests the Government to provide information on any special measures taken under articles 7 and 8 to achieve equality in employment and occupation and any special protective measures in favour of certain categories of persons.

Sexual harassment. The Committee also notes that article 3(3) of the new Law expressly prohibits sexual harassment in the public and private sectors, and that sexual harassment is defined, in article 4(7), as being any type of unwanted behaviour of a sexual nature creating an intimidating or hostile atmosphere. The Committee requests the Government to confirm that the law covers both quid pro quo and hostile environment sexual harassment at work. It also requests the Government to provide information on the practical measures taken to prevent and address sexual harassment in employment and occupation. The Government is also requested to provide information on any instances of sexual harassment addressed by the competent authorities, including any relevant administrative or judicial decisions and the sanctions imposed.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Trinidad and Tobago

Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100) (ratification: 1997)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government’s report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments initially made in 2015.

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Assessing and addressing the gender pay gap. The Committee notes from the statistics provided by the Government on the average monthly income by sex and occupational group that in 2012 the gender pay gap between men and women ranged from 10 per cent (for technician and associate professionals) to 41.8 per cent (for service and shop sales workers). The statistics concerning the average monthly income by sex and industry also show a gender pay gap in favour of men (except in construction), ranging from 1.7 per cent in the transport, storage and communication industry to 50 per cent in the sugar industry in 2010. The Committee welcomes the increase of the national minimum wage as of January 2011, and recalls that women generally predominate in low-wage employment, and that a uniform national minimum wage system helps to raise the earnings of the lowest paid, which has an influence on the relationship between men and women’s wages and on reducing the gender pay gap (see 2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, paragraphs 682–685). Noting that in its report, the Government commits to addressing the gender pay gap and occupational gender segregation, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the concrete steps taken and the progress made in this regard. Please continue to provide detailed statistical data on the earnings of men and women according to occupational group and industry, as well as information on the minimum wage.

Equal remuneration for work of equal value. Legislation. The Committee recalls that the Equal Opportunity Act, 2000, contains no specific provisions regarding equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value. The Government indicates that, in giving effect to the Act, the courts would treat unequal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value as sex-based discrimination. It further indicates that the Equal Opportunity Commission (EOC) acknowledges that the concept of “work of equal value” lies at the heart of the fundamental right to equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value and the promotion of equality. While noting the Government’s indications, the Committee would like to recall that only prohibiting sex-based wage discrimination is normally not sufficient to implement effectively the principle of the Convention as it does not capture the concept of “work of equal value”. The Committee once again urges the Government to take steps to give full legislative expression to the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value and to provide information on any progress in this regard.

Collective agreements. Since 2000, the Committee has been asking the Government to provide information on the progress made in removing sex discriminatory clauses from collective agreements. The Committee notes that the report once again contains no information in this respect. The Committee notes with regret, however, that in the new collective agreement on wages and conditions of service for hourly, daily and weekly rates employees employed in the Port-of-Spain Corporation for 2011–13, sex-specific terminology remains in use to describe a category of workers in the schedule of wage rates which are not gender-neutral (for example, grease man, battery man, watch man, handy man, char woman, female scavenger, labourer (female), labourer (male), etc.). The Committee wishes to recall that, in specifying different occupations and jobs for the purpose of fixing wage rates, gender-neutral terminology should be used to avoid stereotypes as to whether certain jobs should be carried out by a man or a woman (see 2012 General Survey, paragraph 683). The Committee asks the Government to indicate how it is ensured that, in determining wage rates in collective agreements, the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value is effectively taken into account by the social partners and applied, and the work performed by women is not being undervalued in comparison to that of men who are performing different work and using different skills but that is overall of equal value. The Committee also asks the Government to provide information on the progress made in removing sex discriminatory clauses from collective agreements, and to take steps, in collaboration with the employers’ and workers’ organizations, to promote the use of gender-neutral terminology in referring to the various jobs and occupations in the collective agreements.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

The Committee notes with regret that the Government’s report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments initially made in 2015.

Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention. Discrimination based on sex. For nearly 20 years, the Committee has been expressing concern about the discriminatory nature of several provisions providing that married female officers may have their employment terminated if family obligations affect the efficient performance of their duties. In this regard, the Committee welcomes the Government’s indication that Regulation 57 of the Public Service Commission Regulations was revoked in 1998 and Regulation 58 of the Statutory Authorities Service Commission Regulations was revoked in 2006. The Government also indicates that Regulation 52 of the Police Commission Regulations, which provides that the appointment of a married female police officer may be terminated on the ground that her family obligations are affecting the efficient performance of her duties, will be put before the Police Service Commission for consideration. The Committee further recalls the potentially discriminatory impact of section 14(2) of the Civil Service Regulations, which requires a female officer who marries to report the fact of her marriage to the Public Service Commission. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary steps to revoke Regulation 52 of the Police Commission Regulations to eliminate this long-standing discriminatory provision, and to provide information on any progress made in this regard. The Committee also requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken to amend section 14(2) of the Civil Service Regulations to eliminate any potentially discriminatory impact, for example by requiring notification of name changes for both men and women.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Ukraine

Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100) (ratification: 1956)

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Gender pay gap. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that the gender pay gap had not decreased since 2009 and that there was a significant gap in the monthly wages of women and men in certain sectors of the economy. The Government explained that, differences in wages were largely due to the system of the gender division of labour, with women being concentrated in sectors with relatively high educational requirements, but lower wages, primarily in the public sector. The Government also indicated that the State Programme to Ensure Equal Rights and Opportunities for Women and Men, 2013–16, included activities aimed at reducing the gender gap in wages between men and women. The Committee therefore requested the Government to intensify its efforts in reducing the gender pay gap and to provide information on the activities undertaken in the framework of the State Programme to Ensure Equal Rights and Opportunities for Women and Men, 2013–16, in this respect. The Committee notes the Government’s indication in its report that, in 2016, the average monthly gender pay gap was 25.4 per cent and 21.6 per cent in the first quarter of 2017. It further notes, from the data provided by the Government, that the gender pay gap remains particularly high in certain sectors of the economy, for example, in sports, entertainment and recreation (35.8 per cent), postal and courier services (39.4 per cent) and financial and insurance services (39.2 per cent). The Government indicates that differences in wages can be explained by the higher proportion of men in better-paid management positions as well as in work with arduous and dangerous working conditions and in night work, where salaries are higher and women are prohibited to work under the law. With regard to the prohibition of hazardous work for women, the Committee refers to its detailed comments under the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111); as to the prohibition of certain types of employment for women with children, it refers to its detailed comments under the Workers with Family Responsibilities Convention, 1981 (No. 156). The Committee further notes that the Government has not provided information on the impact of the activities undertaken in the framework of the State Programme to Ensure Equal Rights and Opportunities for Women and Men, 2013–16. It notes however, the adoption of a new Programme on providing Equal Rights and Opportunities for Women and Men up to 2021. Therefore, the Committee once again requests the Government to continue its efforts to reduce the gender pay gap, including through identifying and addressing its underlying causes, and to provide information on any activities undertaken under the auspices of implementing the State Programme to Ensure Equal Rights and Opportunities for Women and Men up to 2021, and the results achieved in this respect. The Government is also requested to continue to provide statistical data on the wages and salary levels of men and women, by sector of employment and occupation, and in the various grades and levels of the civil service, as well as by occupational group.

Equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value. Legislation. For a number of years, the Committee has been commenting on section 17 of the Law on Ensuring Equal Rights and Equal Opportunities of Women and Men (2006) which requires the employer to ensure equal pay for men and women for work involving equal skills and working conditions, which is more restrictive than the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value set out in the Convention. Moreover, by linking the right to equal remuneration for men and women to two specific factors of comparison (skills and working conditions), the Committee recalled that section 17 may have the effect of discouraging or even excluding objective job evaluation on the basis of a wider set of criteria, which are crucial in order to eliminate effectively the discriminatory undervaluation of jobs traditionally performed by women. The Committee notes that the Government’s report is silent on this point. However, it recalls the ongoing labour law reform and notes the most recent version of the draft Labour Code, available on the Parliament’s website and dated 24 July 2017. It notes that section 2(1) of the draft Labour Code provides that one of the main principles of legal regulation of labour relations is “ensuring the right to equal remuneration for work of equal value”. It further notes that section 20(1) of the draft Labour Code sets out, as one of the main rights of employees “remuneration for work of equal value”. While it welcomes the introduction of the concept of equal remuneration for work of equal value in the draft Labour Code, the Committee requests the Government to indicate the measures taken to amend section 17 of the Law on Ensuring Equal Rights and Opportunities of Women and Men to give full legislative expression to the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value, and to indicate any progress made in this regard. It also requests the Government to provide information on the adoption of the draft Labour Code, and to provide a copy of the law once adopted. Noting that the Government’s report is silent on the matter, the Committee once again requests the Government to provide information on the implementation and enforcement of the current section 17 of the Law on Ensuring Equal Rights and Equal Opportunities of Women and Men, including the number and outcome of any relevant cases brought before the competent authorities.

Article 3. Objective job evaluation. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that it remained unclear whether the methods used to evaluate the work performed in the different jobs and occupations are appropriate in determining wage rates in a manner that is free from gender bias. The Committee notes the Government’s indication that under section 8 of the Wage Act (1995), as amended in 2014, the conditions and levels of remuneration for employees of institutions and organizations financed by the State are determined by the Cabinet of Ministers. The Government further indicates that section 15 of the Remuneration Act provides that in the private sector, enterprises can determine the conditions and levels of remuneration for their workers independently but must comply with statutory provisions and collective agreements. The Committee notes however that the Remuneration Act does not indicate how the Cabinet of Ministers or private sector enterprises evaluate the work performed and whether the wage-fixing mechanisms use objective criteria free from gender bias. The Committee is bound to recall, once again, that while the Convention does not prescribe a specific method for measuring and comparing the relative value of different jobs, whatever methods are used, particular care must be taken to ensure that they are free from gender bias. The Committee refers the Government to paragraphs 695–703 of its General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, 2012, for further guidance on objective job evaluation.

In light of the persistent gender pay gap and the horizontal and vertical gender segregation of labour recognized by the Government, the Committee once again urges the Government to take specific measures to promote the use of objective job evaluation methods free from gender bias in the public and private sectors, with a view to ensuring the establishment of wages and salary scales in accordance with the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value, and to provide information on any progress achieved in this respect. The Committee encourages the Government to seek ILO technical assistance in this regard.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Gibraltar

Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100)

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Assessing and addressing the gender remuneration gap. The Committee notes, from the 2017 Employment Survey Report published by the Statistics Office, that the gender pay gap continued to decrease but still remains significant. Based on average monthly earnings for full-time employees, the gender pay gap decreased from 26 per cent in 2013 to 22.5 per cent in 2017, being higher in the public sector than in the private sector (28.9 per cent and 25.1 per cent respectively, excluding the Ministry of Defence). With respect to average weekly earnings for full-time employees, the gap decreased from 32 per cent in 2013 to 29.5 per cent in 2017. The Committee however notes that the percentage of women in the three lowest annual earning brackets (less than £10,000) is over double that of men and inversely the percentage of men in the three highest annual earning brackets (above £40,000) is almost double that of women. It further notes from the Employment Survey Report the persistent vertical and horizontal occupational gender segregation, as women still represent 69 per cent of the administrative and secretarial workforce while they represent only 29 per cent of the managers and senior officials employed on a full-time basis, for whom the gender pay gap is particularly high (29.8 per cent). It notes that monthly earnings of men are higher than those of women in all occupational categories, except in the process, plant and machine operatives, which employed only 0.2 per cent of the total number of women at national level. It also notes that average monthly earnings of men are higher than those of women in almost all industrial sectors (with the exception of two sectors employing a very low number of women), the pay gap being particularly high in sectors where most women were employed, such as financial intermediation, where the gender pay gap was 45.3 per cent in 2017, and health and social work, where it was 33.3 per cent. The Committee notes that a working group to look at the gender pay gap was set up in March 2017 within the Ministry for Equality and that, as a result, the Government recently acknowledged the existence of a gender pay gap. The Committee notes that, in September and October 2018, a training session was organized with employers from the private sector on “Gender Diversity and Inclusion” in order to analyse and explore the effects of unconscious bias in the workplace and its impact on women, and a “Women’s Mentorship Programme” was launched by the Government to promote better representation of women in senior positions. Taking into consideration the significant gender pay gap as well as the persistent vertical and horizontal occupational gender segregation, the Committee hopes that the Government will continue its efforts to take more proactive measures, including with employers’ and workers’ organizations, to raise awareness, make assessments, and promote and enforce the application of the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value. It requests the Government to provide information on the specific measures taken to address the gender remuneration gap, both in the public and private sectors, by identifying and addressing the underlying causes of earnings differentials and by promoting women’s access to a wider range of jobs with career prospects and higher pay, including in the framework of the Women’s Mentorship Programme and other activities undertaken to explore the impact of unconscious gender bias in the workplace. The Committee also requests the Government to continue to provide detailed statistics on the earnings of men and women and on the gender remuneration gap, in all sectors of the economy. Finally, it requests the Government to regularly evaluate the effectiveness of the measures taken to address the gender remuneration gap.

Legislation. The Committee previously noted that section 31 of the Equal Opportunities Act, 2006, allows men and women to bring equal pay claims against their employers using comparators employed by the same employer or by any “associated employer” in Gibraltar. It also recalled that the application of the Convention’s principle allows for a much broader comparison to be made between jobs performed by men and women in different places or enterprises, or between different employers. The Committee notes the Government’s statement, in its report, that it is committed to considering any necessary reform of section 31 of the Equal Opportunities Act to this end. Recalling that ensuring a broad scope of comparison is essential for the application of the principle of equal remuneration given the continued prevalence of occupational sex segregation in the country, the Committee requests the Government to provide updated information on any revision of section 31 of the Equal Opportunities Act initiated in order to ensure that the right to equal remuneration between men and women for work of equal value is not restricted to the same or associated employer. In the meantime, it again requests the Government to provide specific information regarding the application in practice of section 31 of the Act, including any administrative or judicial decisions relating to equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value.

Articles 2 and 3. Application of the principle in the public sector. The Committee notes the Government’s indication that no specific job evaluation was undertaken in the public sector with regard to the principle of the Convention. The Government reiterates that the public sector has specific salary scales and job descriptions which apply irrespective of gender and therefore apply the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value. Noting that the highest gender pay gap was identified in the public sector (28.9 per cent in 2017), the Committee once again recalls that despite the existence of salary scales applicable to all public officials, without discrimination on the ground of sex, pay discrimination in the public service can arise from the criteria applied in classifying jobs and from an undervaluation of the tasks performed largely by women, or from inequalities in certain supplementary wage benefits (see 2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, paragraphs 700–703). Recalling the Government’s obligation to ensure the full application of the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value to its own employees, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the criteria used to determine the classification of jobs and the applicable salary scales in the public sector, and to indicate how it is ensured that the criteria used are free from gender bias and that men and women in the public sector have access to all additional payments on an equal footing. In light of the substantial gender pay gap identified in the public service, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the distribution of men and women in the various occupations and positions in the public sector, to identify where wage gaps exist and to take the necessary steps to eliminate any wage gaps revealed. It also requests the Government to provide information on any measures taken to improve the access of women to higher ranking and better paid positions in the public sector, and the results achieved.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.
The Committee notes the Government’s indication in its report that the legislation lacks essential definitions, such as of the term “remuneration”, due to the fact that there is no systematic body of labour standards. Nevertheless, the Government indicates that the need has not been felt up to now for the existence of such definitions. The Committee also notes the Government’s reference to the study “Persistent inequalities: Labour market, skills and gender”, undertaken in 2014 by the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP), according to which, neither the greater labour market participation of women nor their higher skill levels have succeeded in reducing the wage gap. The study indicates that the factors which contribute to the wage gap between men and women workers include horizontal segregation in education, which has the effect of further strengthening the concentration of women workers in certain sectors and activities; the difficulties encountered by women in gaining access to higher level jobs; and career responsibilities, which result in women devoting fewer hours than men to paid work during the life cycle. The Committee notes that, according to the study, the greatest wage gap is found among employees at the tertiary level, where there is a significantly higher proportion of women than men (63.4 per cent). For example, among accountancy and financial auxiliaries, the wage gap is 30 per cent, and it is 20 per cent among professional doctors and similar personnel, and 32 per cent between specialists in social and human sciences. The study also notes that in the two primary occupations in which women are engaged, that is primary school and pre-school teaching, and office work, the wage gap is almost 13 per cent. The Committee notes the Government’s indication that, with a view to eliminating gender wage gaps, awareness-raising campaigns are continuing to be undertaken with a view to transforming current cultural attitudes. The development of a comprehensive system of care has also been promoted, in respect of which the Committee refers to its comments on the application of the Workers with Family Responsibilities Convention, 1981 (No. 156). The Committee also notes the National Strategy for Gender Equality 2030 which includes, among the various types of action envisaged by 2030: (i) promoting the application of the principle of equal remuneration for work of equal value; (ii) eliminating educational segregation and promoting the access of women to areas related to science; and (iii) reducing horizontal and vertical occupational segregation in the public and private sectors. The Committee also notes with interest that Act No. 19580 on gender-based violence against women, of 22 December 2017, by recognizing the “lower wages for work performed due to the fact of being a woman” as a form of labour violence against women (section 6), provides that the Ministry of Labour and Social Security and any other body or institution connected with labour and social security policies shall promote measures to guarantee the exercise of the “right to equal remuneration for work of equal value” without discrimination (section 23). However, the Act does not define the concept of “work of equal value” or of “remuneration”. The Committee recalls that the concept of “work of equal value” includes, but goes beyond equal remuneration for “equal”, “the same” or “similar” work, and also encompasses work that is of an entirely different nature which is nevertheless of equal value, and it emphasizes the importance of a clear legislative framework to ensure the application of the Convention in practice.

Under these conditions, recalling the importance of guaranteeing that men and women have a legal basis for asserting their right to equal remuneration in respect of their employers and the competent authorities, the Committee once again requests the Government to consider giving full legislative effect to the principle of the Convention and including in the legislation a definition of the term “remuneration”, in accordance with Article 1(a) of the Convention, and to provide information on any developments in this regard. The Committee also requests the Government to continue providing information on any measures adopted with a view to reducing the wage gap between men and women workers, including the measures adopted within the framework of the National Gender Equality Strategy 2030 and Act No. 19580 on gender-based violence against women, including any measure adopted with a view to addressing educational and occupational segregation between men and women, and the results achieved. Noting the Government’s indication that the greatest wage gap is found among employees at the tertiary level, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the reasons why the wage gap is wider in higher level jobs.

The Committee notes the observations of the International Union of Food, Agricultural, Hotel, Restaurant, Catering, Tobacco and Allied Workers’ Associations (IUF), received on 1 September 2017, alleging the Government’s alleged failure to comply with the principle of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to provide its comments thereon.

Article 1 of the Convention. Legislative framework. The Committee recalls that for a number of years it has been referring to the need to amend the Labour Code of 21 December 1995, which prohibits discrimination on the basis of sex with regard to remuneration, but which does not fully reflect the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value as set out in the Convention. It previously noted that the Government was taking steps to improve the draft law on “guarantees of equal rights and equal opportunities for women and men” aimed at preventing discrimination against women. The Committee notes from the Government’s report that the Chamber of Commerce and Industry reviewed and proposed amendments to the draft Equal Rights and Opportunities (Men and Women) Act. However, it notes from the IUF’s observations that although the draft law was first submitted to Parliament in 2004, it has not yet been adopted. The Committee further notes with regret that the Government’s report once more provides no information on its plans to bring the Labour Code into conformity with the Convention. The Committee stresses again that the concept of “work of equal value” lies at the heart of the fundamental right of equal remuneration for men and women, and the promotion of equality. This concept permits a broad scope of comparison, including but going beyond equal remuneration for “equal work” or work performed under “equal conditions”, and also encompasses work that is of an entirely different nature, but which is nevertheless of equal value (see 2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, paragraph 673). Recalling that provisions that are narrower than the principle laid down in the Convention hinder progress in eradicating gender-based pay discrimination, the Committee urges the Government to take steps to give full legislative expression to the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value, ensuring that the provision encompasses not only equal work or work performed under equal conditions, but also work of an entirely different nature which is nevertheless of equal value, and to provide information on the steps taken in this regard.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee notes the observations of the International Union of Food, Agricultural, Hotel, Restaurant, Catering, Tobacco and Allied Workers’ Associations (IUF) received on 1 September 2017 alleging the Government’s failure to comply with the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to provide its comments thereon.

The Committee notes with regret that the Government’s report once again contains no information in response to a number of its previous requests. The Committee wishes to stress that without the necessary information, it is not in a position to assess the effective implementation of the Convention, including any progress achieved since its ratification. The Committee urges the Government to ensure that the next report contains full information on the matters raised below.

Article 11(1)(a) of the Convention. Discrimination based on sex. Sexual harassment. The Committee notes that the Government once again has provided no information in response to its request for information on awareness-raising activities and on measures taken to prohibit sexual harassment in the relevant legislation. The Committee recalls that sexual harassment is a serious manifestation of sex discrimination and a violation of human rights, and is to be addressed within the context of the Convention. Given the gravity and serious repercussions of sexual harassment, the Committee wishes to stress the importance of taking effective measures to prevent and prohibit sexual harassment in employment and occupation. Such steps should address both quid pro quo and hostile work environment sexual harassment. The Committee urges the Government to take steps to include provisions defining and prohibiting both quid pro quo and hostile environment sexual harassment in legislation. Recalling that it has been raising this issue since 2005, the Committee urges the Government to identify any practical steps taken to raise awareness and address the issue of sexual harassment in employment and occupation and any related collaboration with the workers’ and employers’ organizations.

Workers with family responsibilities. For a number of years the Committee has been asking the Government to amend the sections of Chapter IV of the Labour Code which contain measures applying to persons with family responsibilities which are only available to women workers (sections 228, 228(1), 229, and 232), and to fathers only in exceptional circumstances for example, where the mother has died or is hospitalized long-term (section 238). The Committee notes that the Government has not provided any information in this regard. It further notes, from the Government’s report under the Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100), enclosing an example of a collective agreement, that numerous provisions provide special protection and benefits to women with children or “people bringing up children without their mother”. The Committee, therefore, once again emphasizes that when legislation reflects the assumption that the main responsibility for family care lies with women or excludes men from certain family-related rights and benefits, it reinforces stereotypes regarding the roles of women and men in the family and in society. The Committee considers that, in order to achieve the objective of the Convention, measures to assist workers with family Discrimination based on religion. The Committee notes the IUF’s observations according to which Muslim women who wear the hijab, face discrimination including in education, when applying for jobs and in employment. The IUF cites, as an example, cases where Muslim women were forced to quit their jobs, were banned from running their own business, intimidated and expelled from higher education. The Committee further notes, from the Report of the United Nations Special Rapporteur on freedom of religion or belief on his mission to Uzbekistan that a 2017–21 Action Strategy for the development of five priority areas was adopted, and that area V covers religious tolerance and inter-ethnic harmony (A/HRC/37/49/Add.2, paragraph 2). The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the specific measures taken to tackle discrimination on the grounds of religion in employment or occupations, including in the framework of the 2017–21 Action Strategy, and on the results achieved. Please also provide a copy of the 2017–21 Action Strategy.

Article 5. Special measures of protection on the basis of sex. The Committee recalls that since 2005, it has been asking the Government to provide a copy of the list of jobs with harmful working conditions in which women are prohibited from working, referred to in section 225 of the Labour Code. The Committee notes with regret that the Government has not provided the list and merely states that distinctions in employment are not deemed discriminatory if they are determined by the characteristics of the job or by the State’s special concern for persons in need of greater social protection. The Committee notes from the IUF’s observations that it considers that the inclusion of women in the category of people requiring enhanced social protection leaves open the possibility of direct discrimination against women. The Committee recalls that protective measures for women may be broadly categorized into those aimed at protecting maternity in the strict sense, which come within the scope of Article 5, and those aimed at protecting women generally because of their sex or gender, based on stereotypical perceptions about their capabilities and appropriate role in society, which are contrary to the Convention and constitute obstacles to the recruitment and employment of women (see the 2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, paragraphs 838–840). The Committee therefore urges the Government to provide a copy of the list of jobs with harmful working conditions in which women are prohibited from working referred to in section 225 of the Labour Code, in order to enable the Committee to assess whether this list of prohibited jobs constitutes a special measure falling under the scope of Article 5.

Article 1 of the Convention. Equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value. Legislation. The Committee previously noted that a definition of “equal pay for work of equal value” was included in the draft Employment Act (Amendment Bill) but drew the Government’s attention to the fact that this definition was narrower than the concept set out in Article 1(b) of the Convention. The Committee takes note of the adoption of the Employment Amendment Act in 2015 but observes that it does not contain any provision in this regard. It notes the Government’s indication, in its report, that a Labour Code is currently being drafted and would take into consideration the concerns previously expressed by the Committee. The Committee notes with interest that section 31(1)(e) of the Gender Equity and Equality Act, adopted on 23 December 2015, provides that a woman has, on an equal basis with a man, “the same right to equal remuneration, benefits and treatment in respect of work of equal value”. It notes that “work of equal value” is defined as “work that is equal in terms of the demands it makes with regard to matters such as skill, duty, physical and material effort, responsibility, conditions of work and remuneration”. It observes that the definition of the term “remuneration” corresponds to the definition provided by Article 1(a). The Committee further notes that section 31(2)(e) provides that “an employer shall not discriminate against a woman when determining remuneration, benefits, retirement and social security” according to section 31(4)(c) and (d), and that “a person, public body or private body shall not fail to respect the principle of equal pay for equal work; or perpetuate disproportionate income differentials deriving from past discrimination”; a person who contravenes these provisions commits an offence and may be convicted with a fine (section 31(6)). Noting that section 31(2)(e) refers to equal pay for “equal work”, the Committee draws the Government’s attention to the fact that the concept of “work of equal value”, which lies at the heart of the fundamental right of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value, goes beyond equal remuneration for “equal”, “the same” or “similar” work, and also encompasses work that is of an entirely different nature, which is nevertheless of equal value (see 2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, paragraph 673). The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the actual methods and criteria used to evaluate the “demands” made by a specific job, in order to ensure that the definition of the expression “work of equal value” provided for in section 31 of the Gender Equity and Equality Act, 2015, permits a broad scope of comparison in practice, including but going beyond equal remuneration for equal work, as required by the Convention. It requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken to raise awareness among workers, employers and their respective organizations of the new equal remuneration provisions and the existence of penalties for non-observance. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the application and enforcement of section 31 of the Gender Equity and Equality Act in practice, particularly the number of infringements reported to labour inspectors, courts and the Gender Equity and Equality Commission and the penalties imposed. In light of the ongoing legislative developments, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the status of the elaboration of the draft Labour Code and hopes that it will fully reflect the principle of the Convention.

Earnings differentials between men and women. The Committee previously noted the persistent vertical and horizontal segregation of men and women in certain sectors and occupations, as well as the significant gender pay gap. It notes from the 2017 labour market indicators available from the Central Statistical Office that 33.1 per cent of the working population is in the formal sector and that 24.8 per cent of the population is formally employed, only 26.3 per cent of whom are women. It notes that, in 2018, the Central Statistical Office published a report ‘Gender statistics on women’s representation in local government’ indicating that Zambia is one of the lowest ranked countries in the Southern African Development Community (SADC) region in terms of women’s participation at local government level (9 per cent as of 2016), and highlighted the need to strengthen the collection and presentation of quality gender statistics in order to ensure that adequate information is available and accessible to undertake gender analysis for more targeted interventions and the effective participation of women at all levels. While noting the absence of available information on the earnings of men and women in the different sectors and occupations, the Committee notes with concern the Government’s statement that there is no gender pay gap in the country but only male- or female-dominated industries. It notes that the National Gender Equality Policy, as revised in 2014, highlights that women are concentrated in the lowest-paying sectors and non-technical jobs as a result of their lower education levels, and acknowledges that discrimination against women in the country is embodied in traditional rules and practices resulting in lasting constraints on women’s socio-economic empowerment and progress. Noting that the elimination of gender bias has been identified as an objective of the Gender Equity and Equality Act, 2015, the Committee draws the Government’s attention to the fact that, due to historical attitudes towards the role of women in society, along with stereotypical assumptions regarding women’s aspirations, preferences and capabilities and their suitability for certain jobs, certain jobs are held predominantly or exclusively by women (such as in caring professions) and others by men (such as in construction). Often “female jobs” are undervalued in comparison with work of equal value performed by men when determining wage rates. Comparing the relative value of jobs in occupations which may involve different types of skills, responsibilities or working conditions, but which are nevertheless of equal value overall, is essential in order to eliminate pay discrimination resulting from the failure to recognize the value of work performed by women and men free from gender bias. The Committee recalls that the principle has been applied to compare the remuneration received by men and women engaged in different occupations, such as wardens in sheltered accommodation for the elderly (predominantly women) and security guards in office premises (predominantly men); or school meal supervisors (predominantly women) and garden and park supervisors (predominantly men) (see 2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, paragraphs 673 and 675). The Committee requests the Government to strengthen its efforts to take more proactive measures, including with employers’ and workers’ organizations, to raise awareness, make assessments, and promote and enforce the application of the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value. It requests the Government to provide information on the specific measures taken to address the gender remuneration gap by identifying and addressing the underlying causes of pay differentials such as vertical and horizontal job segregation and gender stereotypes, covering both the formal and informal economy, and by promoting women’s access to a wider range of jobs with career prospects and higher pay, including in the context of the revised National Gender Equality Policy and the Gender Equity and Equality Act, 2015. Recalling that collecting, analysing and disseminating information is important in identifying and addressing inequality in remuneration, it requests the Government to provide updated statistical information on the earnings of men and women in all the sectors and occupations of the economy. The Committee reminds the Government of the possibility to avail itself of ILO technical assistance in this regard.

Article 1 of the Convention. Definition of discrimination. The Committee previously noted that the definition of discrimination in the draft Employment Act (Amendment Bill) does not appear to include the grounds of national extraction and colour, and that the ground of “social status” may have a narrower meaning that the ground of “social origin” set out in the Convention. The Committee notes that, as a result of the adoption of the Employment Amendment Act in 2015, the new section 36(3) of the Employment Act provides that “race, colour, sex, marital status, family responsibilities, pregnancy, religion, political opinion or affiliation, ethnicity, tribal affiliation or social status of the employee” cannot constitute a valid reason for termination. It further notes the adoption of the Constitution of Zambia (Amendment) Act, 2016, which provides that equality and non-discrimination are part of the national values and principles and defines “discrimination” as meaning “directly or indirectly treating a person differently on the basis of that person’s birth, race, sex, origin, colour, age, disability, religion, conscience, belief, culture, language, tribe, pregnancy, health, or marital, ethnic, social or economic status” (sections 8 and 266). While welcoming the inclusion of the ground of “colour” in both new laws, the Committee notes that despite its previous recommendations the new provisions do not refer to the grounds of “national extraction” and “social origin” set out in Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention. The Committee further notes that, while the Government previously indicated that the new Employment Act would contain a comprehensive definition of discrimination, the Act only refers to discrimination in case of termination of employment. The Committee wishes to emphasize that the principle of equality of opportunity and treatment should apply to all aspects of employment and occupation which include access to vocational training, access to employment and to particular occupations, and terms and conditions of employment, as provided for in Article 1(3) of the Convention. It recalls that clear and comprehensive definitions of what constitutes discrimination in employment and occupation are instrumental in identifying and addressing the many manifestations in which it may occur (see 2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, paragraph 743).

The Committee requests the Government to provide updated information on the practical application of section 36(3) of the Employment Act, including a copy of any court decisions on cases where dismissal was based on prohibited grounds, more particularly on the ground of “social status” in order to enable the Committee to assess its meaning in practice, and the remedies provided. In light of the legislative developments referred to in its comments under the Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100), concerning the current elaboration of a Labour Code, the Committee requests the Government to strengthen its efforts to give full legislative expression to the principle of the Convention by defining and prohibiting direct and indirect discrimination in all aspects of employment and occupation with respect to all the grounds set out in Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention and to provide information on any progress made in this regard.

Article 1(1)(a). Discrimination based on sex. Sexual Harassment. The Committee previously noted that sexual harassment was only addressed through the Penal Code and that amendment of section 137A(1) was planned to incorporate provisions of the Anti-Gender Based Violence Act, 2011, to extend the offence of sexual harassment against children in the workplace to an offence of sexual harassment “against a person”, and the setting up of a Fast-Track Court to deal with the delays in dispensing of cases of gender-based violence in the court system. The Committee notes the Government’s indication that the revision process of section 137A(1) of the Penal Code is still ongoing. The Committee notes with interest the adoption of the Gender Equity and Equality Act, on 23 December 2015, which prohibits both quid pro quo and hostile working environment sexual harassment and provides that the Gender Equity and Equality Commission has the power to order any remedies or compensation (section 42(5)). It further notes that section 40 of the Act provides that the Government shall develop and implement appropriate policy and procedures to entitle victims of sexual harassment to have access to appropriate disciplinary and grievance procedures and that employers have an obligation to implement and communicate to all persons, including employees, on such procedures. The Committee however notes that, in the framework of the Universal Periodic Review, the United Nations country team recently stated that, while perpetrators of sexual harassment in the private and public sectors had been prosecuted, employers in such cases had not been held accountable for failure to protect women employees (A/HRC/WG.6/28/ZMB/2, 28 August 2017, paragraph 36). The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the practical application of sections 39 and 40 of the Gender Equity and Equality Act, 2015, including on appropriate policies and awareness-raising measures implemented to address all forms of sexual harassment in employment and occupation, as well as to provide information on the number of complaints filed and the remedies provided. The Committee once again requests the Government to supply a copy of the relevant clauses of the Public Service Disciplinary Code defining sexual harassment and discrimination.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Zimbabwe

Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100) (ratification: 1989)

The Committee notes the observations of the Zimbabwe Congress of Trade Unions (ZCTU) of 31 August 2017, as well as the Government’s reply received on 2 November 2017.

Article 1 of the Convention. Work of equal value. The Committee has been referring for a number of years to section 5(2)(a) of the Labour Act which provides for equal remuneration between men and women for work of equal value but defines “work of equal value” as meaning “work that involves similar or substantially similar skills, duties, responsibilities and conditions”, which could unduly restrict the scope of comparison of jobs performed by men and women. The Committee notes the Government’s indication, in its report, that an agreement was reached with the social partners to amend the definition of “work of equal value” and that a draft bill amending the Labour Act is being elaborated, inter alia, to ensure that “work of equal value” has a broader scope as provided for in the Convention. While recalling its previous comments on article 65(6) of the Constitution, which only provides for equal remuneration for “similar work” and thus did not fully reflect the concept of “work of equal value”, the Committee notes the ZCTU’s statement that the draft bill provides that “equal remuneration for men and women workers for work of equal value refers to the rate of remuneration established without basing on gender” which in ZCTU’s view does not address the concerns previously raised by the Committee. The Committee notes that the Government encourages the ZCTU to bring this issue before the Tripartite Negotiating Forum (TNF) as the draft bill will take into consideration all the concerns expressed by the tripartite partners. While noting that the provision in the draft bill does not seem to define what should be considered as “work of equal value”, the Committee again draws the Government’s attention to the fact that the concept of “work of equal value” as provided for under the Convention is fundamental to tackling occupational sex segregation in the labour market, as it permits a broad scope of comparison, including, but going beyond equal remuneration for “equal”, “the same”, or “similar” work, but also encompassing work of an entirely different nature, which is nevertheless of equal value (see 2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, paragraphs 672–675). In light of the ongoing legislative developments, the Committee trusts that the Government will take the opportunity of the amendment of the Labour Act to effectively consider the concerns raised by the Committee, for a number of years, in order to ensure that the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value will be fully reflected in the national legislation, and that the final text of the Labour Act will allow for the comparison not only of work that involves similar qualifications and skills, effort, responsibilities and conditions of work, but also of work of an entirely different nature which is nevertheless of equal value. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on any progress made in this regard.

Article 2. Measures to address the gender pay gap. The Committee previously noted the continuing vertical and horizontal occupational segregation, as well as the persistent gender pay gap with women being concentrated in low-paying jobs, mostly in the agriculture and private domestic sectors. Referring to its previous comments on the National Gender Policy (2013–17) which provides for a strategy to advocate equity in formal employment and remuneration, and mechanisms that increase opportunities for women’s employment, the Committee notes the Government’s general indication that the Ministry of Public Service, Labour and Social Welfare is working towards ensuring equal opportunities for men and women in the labour market. The Committee however notes the ZCTU’s statement that no tangible progress has been made with regard to the gender pay gap, and that comprehensive measures must be taken by the Government to address the real causes of the gender pay gap. It notes the ZCTU’s indication that, according to the data available in 2016 from the Zimbabwe National Statistics Agency (Zimstat), only 14 per cent of economically active women were in paid employment (against 30 per cent of men), as the majority of women are unemployed, underemployed or employed in the informal economy. The Committee notes that, according to the last Labour Force Survey, published in March 2015 by the Zimstat, the share of informal employment of total employment increased from 84.2 per cent in 2011 to 94.5 per cent in 2014, and it was estimated that women still accounted for 52.4 per cent within the informal economy. It also notes that the survey on the “Situational analysis of women in the informal economy in Zimbabwe” published by the ILO in 2017, highlighted that women employed in the informal economy receive only low and irregular incomes as it was estimated that 61.3 per cent of women in the informal economy were earning below US$100 per month (pages 11–12). The Committee requests the Government to provide detailed information on any measures taken in the context of the National Gender Policy (2013–17) or otherwise to advocate equity in remuneration and address the structural causes of the gender pay gap, including occupational gender segregation of the labour market and the low rates of remuneration for jobs predominantly occupied by women. Noting that the National Gender Policy 2013–17 provides for a monitoring and evaluation framework, the Committee requests the Government to forward a copy of any report assessing the impact of the policy as well as to provide information on any follow-up measures envisaged.

Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111)

(ratification: 1999)

The Committee notes the observations of the Zimbabwe Congress of Trade Unions (ZCTU) of 31 August 2017, as well as the Government’s reply received on 2 November 2017.

Article 1(1)(a) and (b) of the Convention. Grounds of discrimination. Legislation. The Committee previously noted that while the Labour Act does not prohibit discrimination on the grounds of national extraction and social origin, which are listed in Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention, article 56 of the Constitution of 2013 includes “social origin” but refers only to the grounds of “nationality” and “place of birth” without expressly referring to the ground of “national extraction”. The Committee notes the Government’s indication, in its report, that the grounds of “place of birth” and “ethnic origin” listed in article 56 of the Constitution cover “national extraction”, and that section 5(1) of the Labour Act will be amended to incorporate all the grounds enumerated in the Constitution. The Committee notes the ZCTU’s indication that it hopes that in its instruction to the Attorney General the Government will ensure that “national extraction” and “social origin” are included in the bill amending the Labour Act, as agreed by the social partners in the framework of the Tripartite Negotiating Forum (TNF). In light of the review of the Labour Act, the Committee trusts that the Government will take all the necessary steps to ensure that the Labour Act will prohibit direct and indirect discrimination on at least all the grounds enumerated in Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention, including national extraction and social origin, for all workers and with respect to all aspects of employment, and requests the Government to provide information on any progress made in this regard. It further requests the Government to provide information on the interpretation made by the labour inspectorate of the expressions “nationality”, “ethnic origin” and “place of birth” listed in article 56 of the Constitution and on their application in practice.

Articles 2 and 3. National policy to promote equality of opportunity and treatment between men and women. The Committee takes note of the revised version of the National Gender Policy for 2013–17, forwarded by the Government, which includes new priority areas, namely “gender and disability”, and “gender, culture and religion”. It notes however that no change was introduced in the previously planned strategies to promote equality and equity in access to economic opportunities for men and women, and to ensure access in training opportunities for men and women with a view to improving their equal participation in the workplace, the labour market and in public administration. The Committee notes the Government’s general statement that there has been progress in relation to the promotion of equality of opportunity and treatment between men and women in the context of the implementation of the National Gender Policy. The Government adds that through the revised National Gender Policy, a monitoring and evaluation framework dealing specifically with gender equality and women’s empowerment is being finalized to enable the national gender machinery to monitor and assess the implementation of national, regional and international commitments taken in this area. The Committee notes, however, that, in the ZCTU’s view, no improvement has been made with respect to gender equality in employment and occupation. The Committee notes that, according to the last Zimbabwe Demographic Health Survey (ZDHS) – a sample survey conducted in 2015 by the Government – the employment rate of women increased from 37 per cent in 2010–11 to 41 per cent in 2015 (against 65 per cent for men), with women being mostly concentrated in the sales and services sector (49 per cent against 36 per cent in 2010–11), followed by the agriculture sector (18 per cent against 21 per cent in 2010–11). Referring to its comments on the Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100), the Committee notes, however, the ZCTU’s indication that, according to the data available in 2016 from the Zimbabwe National Statistics Agency (ZIMSTAT), only 14 per cent of economically active women were in paid employment (against 30 per cent of men), since the majority of women are unemployed, underemployed or employed in the informal economy.

The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the specific steps taken as a result of the implementation of the National Gender Policy concerning the areas of employment, education and training, as well as on any review undertaken to assess the implementation of the Policy, including as a result of the monitoring and evaluation framework dealing specifically with gender equality and women’s empowerment. It further requests the Government to provide information on any positive measures adopted to address past gender discrimination and enhance women’s economic empowerment and access to decision-making positions, and their impact on improving equality of opportunity and equal treatment between men and women in employment and occupation. The Committee requests the Government to provide updated statistical information on the participation of men and women in education, training, employment and occupation, disaggregated by occupational categories and positions.

Gender Commission. Referring to its previous comments on article 245 of the Constitution of 2013, which provides for the establishment of the Gender Commission, the Committee notes with interest the adoption of the Gender Commission Act (Chapter 10:31), enacted in 2016, which operationalizes the Commission and provides that it can, inter alia, receive and handle public complaints on gender-based discrimination and recommend appropriate redress. It can also investigate any systemic barrier to gender equality and report to Parliament on the nature, extent and consequences of such barrier, identifying any legislative, administrative or other practical reform that should be taken to remedy the situation (sections 4–7). The Committee further notes that the Commission is required to organize a Gender Forum to discuss any issue related to its functions annually (section 8). The Committee notes that in 2017 capacity-building activities on international labour standards and gender equality were undertaken by the ILO within the Gender Commission in order to enable it to better promote gender equality and non-discrimination within the country. It notes the Government’s indication that as a result the Commission held various awareness-raising and capacity-building activities, both at national and community levels, on gender equality and women’s economic empowerment, particularly at the decision-making level. It further notes that the Commission has developed an investigations and complaints handling manual to guide its investigative functions. The Committee notes, however, that while welcoming the establishment of the Gender Commission, the ZCTU highlights the absence of any effective activities by the Commission in the fields of employment and occupation. Noting the Government’s statement that no case has yet been handled by the Gender Commission, the Committee hopes that the Government will take the necessary steps to fully operationalize the Gender Commission. It also requests the Government to provide information on the number, nature and outcome of any cases of discrimination in employment and occupation addressed by the Commission, and to provide a copy of the investigations and complaints handling manual. It further requests the Government to provide information on any systemic barriers to gender equality investigated and reported to Parliament, particularly in the fields of employment and occupation. It requests the Government to continue to provide information on the activities of the Gender Commission, including on the specific awareness-raising activities undertaken, with regard to discrimination in employment and occupation, among public officials, employers, workers, and their respective organizations, including in the framework of the annual Gender Forums or otherwise.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Tripartite consultation

Antigua and Barbuda

Article 5(1) of the Convention. Effective tripartite consultations. The Government indicates in its report that the National Labour Board is currently engaged in the revision of the Labour Code. The Committee notes that the Government envisages establishing a subcommittee composed of members of the National Labour Board, along with representatives of workers and employers, to review international labour standards, engage the public in consultations when necessary and to make recommendations to the Minister on actions to be taken. The Committee notes, however, that once again the Government’s report does not contain information with regard to tripartite consultations on the matters related to international labour standards covered by Article 5(1) of the Convention. Recalling its comments since 2008 concerning the activities of the National Labour Board, and noting that section B7 of the Labour Code, which establishes the Board’s procedures, does not include the matters set out in Article 5(1) of the Convention, the Committee once again requests the Government to provide detailed information on the activities of the National Labour Board on matters related to international labour standards covered by the Convention. It further requests the Government to identify the body or bodies mandated to carry out the tripartite consultations required to give effect to the Convention. The Committee reiterates its request that the Government provide precise and detailed information on the content and outcome of the tripartite consultations held on all matters concerning international labour standards covered by Article 5(1)(a)–(e) of the Convention, especially those relating to the questionnaires on Conference agenda items (Article 5(1)(a)); reports to be presented on the application of ratified Conventions (Article 5(1)(d)); and proposals for the denunciation of ratified Conventions (Article 5(1)(e)).

Article 5(1)(b). Submission to Parliament. The Government reiterates information provided in April 2014, indicating that the 20 instruments adopted by the Conference from its 83rd to its 101st Sessions (1996–2012) were resubmitted to Parliament on 11 March 2014. It adds that a request would be made to the Minister by 15 November 2017 via the Labour Commissioner and Permanent Secretary concerning submission of the instruments to Parliament. The Committee refers to its longstanding observations on the obligation to submit and once again requests the Government to indicate whether effective consultations leading to conclusions or modifications were held with respect to the proposals made to the Parliament of Antigua and Barbuda in connection with the submission of the above-mentioned instruments, including information regarding the date(s) on which the instruments were submitted to Parliament. In addition, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the content, agenda, discussions and resolutions and on the outcome of the tripartite consultations held in relation to the submission of instruments adopted by the Conference as of 2014: the Protocol of 2014 to the Forced Labour Convention, 1930, and the Forced Labour (Supplementary Measures) Recommendation, 2014 (No. 203), adopted by the Conference at its 103rd Session, as well as the Transition from the Informal to the Formal Economy Recommendation, 2015 (No. 204), adopted by the Conference at its 104th Session.

Article 5(1)(c). Examination of unratified Conventions and Recommendations. The Government reports that the unratified conventions noted in its report were submitted to the National Labour Board on 11 November 2017 for re-examination with the social partners. The Committee requests the Government to provide updated information on the outcome of the re-examination of unratified Conventions, in particular: (i) the Labour Inspection (Agriculture) Convention, 1969 (No. 129), which is deemed a governance Convention; (ii) the Holidays with Pay Convention (Revised), 1970 (No. 132), (which revises the Weekly Rest (Industry) Convention, 1921 (No. 14); the Holidays with Pay (Agriculture) Convention, 1952 (No. 101), to which Antigua and Barbuda is a State party); and (iii) the Seafarers’ Identity Documents Convention (Revised), 2003 (No. 185), (which revises the Seafarers’ Identity Documents Convention, 1958 (No. 108), that has also been ratified by Antigua and Barbuda).

Botswana

Article 5 (1) of the Convention. Effective tripartite consultations. In response to the Committee’s previous comments, the Government indicates that consultations have been held with the Botswana Federation of Trade Unions (BFTU), the Botswana Federation of Public Service Employees Union (BOFEPUSU) and Business Botswana (BB) on matters to be discussed by the International Labour Conference (ILC). It adds that the Minister of Employment, Labour Productivity and Skills Development is responsible for submitting Conventions and Recommendations to the National Assembly for discussion regarding their possible ratification. The Government specifies that reports submitted under article 22 of the ILO Constitution are prepared in consultation with the social partners. The Committee notes the Government’s indication that, on 24 May 2018, the Government and the social partners discussed the agenda of the 107th Session of the ILC. The Government also indicates that an ILO expert conducted a gap analysis in relation to the possible ratification of the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81), and the Labour Inspection (Agriculture) Convention, 1969 (No. 129), which were submitted to the competent authority for consideration. The Committee notes that the Government does not provide information on effective tripartite consultations held on the submission of instruments adopted by the Conference (Article 5(1)(b)) or the possible denunciation of ratified Conventions (Article 5(1)(e)). The Committee also welcomes the information provided in the Government’s report concerning the jurisprudence of the Court of Appeals in respect of the application of the Convention. In particular, it notes the Court’s ruling, which invalidated Statutory Instrument No. 57 of 2011 due to lack of prior consultation with the social partners. The Committee reiterates its request that the Government provide updated detailed information concerning the content and outcome of effective tripartite discussions held within the Labour Advisory Board and the High Level Consultative Committee (Sub-HLCC), indicating the frequency of such consultations, on all matters related to international labour standards within the scope of Article 5(1) of the Convention, particularly in relation to the possible ratification of Conventions Nos 81 and 129. In addition, the Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on jurisprudence relevant to the application of the provisions of the Convention.

Chad

Technical assistance. In its conclusions of June 2013, the Conference Committee invited the Government to take all appropriate measures to ensure the effective operation of the procedures required by this governance Convention. The Government states in its report, received in November 2014, that it always advocates social dialogue with the social partners. The Committee notes that the Government submitted reports on ratified Conventions to the social partners for any possible observations, as agreed at a workshop held in Dakar in July 2014 on constitutional obligations. The Committee was also informed about a capacity-building workshop on international labour standards and social dialogue, which was held in Ndjamena in September 2014. With ILO assistance, and in the framework of the follow-up requested by the Conference Committee pursuant to a tripartite discussion held in June 2013, the participants put forward various proposals to strengthen the consultation procedures required by the Convention, including the convening of a tripartite workshop with the departments and units to address the information required in the Committee of Expert’s comments, and a tripartite workshop for the validation of reports before they are submitted to the ILO. The Committee invites the Government to submit further information on the progress made as a result of the assistance received from the ILO on matters related to tripartite consultations and social dialogue.

Articles 2 and 5 of the Convention. Consultation mechanisms and effective tripartite consultations. The Government states that in 2013, the Higher Committee for Labour and Social Security convened with a view to incorporating the technical comments in the draft Labour Code. The Committee also notes that this Higher Committee was inactive in 2014. The Committee invites the Government to provide detailed information on the consultations held on all the items covered by Article 5(1) of the Convention.

Article 4(2). Training. The Government confirms that training for participants in consultative procedures is necessary, but that more often than not there is a problem of funding. The Committee notes the possibility of the Government intervening directly or through third-party development partners to make training possible. The Committee invites the Government to describe any arrangements made for the financing of any necessary training of participants on the consultative procedures. The Committee expects that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Côte d’Ivoire

Article 5(1) of the Convention. Effective tripartite consultations. The Government, in reply to the Committee’s previous comments, indicates that a draft Order on the creation of a tripartite advisory committee on international labour standards is being examined by the tripartite constituents, with a view to its adoption and the appointment of its members. It adds that meetings are always organized by the Ministry of Labour to examine the matters relating to international labour standards covered by Article 5 of the Convention, as well as any issues relating to labour in particular and to society in general. For example, the Government refers to the significant involvement of trade union organizations in Labour Day celebrations and the regular convening of the Labour Advisory Committee. It indicates that as soon as the tripartite advisory committee on international labour standards has been established, which is scheduled for 2018, the instruments to be submitted to the competent authority will be presented to the committee before being transmitted to the Government and then to the National Assembly. The Government indicates that it may avail itself of ILO technical support to ensure that the committee is operational. The Committee notes that the social partners are contacted by official letters so that they may comment on the Committee’s comments and questionnaires, as well as on the draft final report. The Government nevertheless indicates that these letters are not always followed by a response. In its General Survey on tripartite consultation international labour standards, 2000, paragraph 71, the Committee notes that under the terms of paragraph 2(3) of the Tripartite Consultation (Activities of the International Labour Organisation) Recommendation, 1976 (No. 152), consultations through written communications should be undertaken only “where those involved in the consultative procedures are agreed that such communications are appropriate and sufficient”. In this regard, the Committee requests the Government to indicate whether the written consultative procedure was previously agreed with the social partners. In light of the Government’s stated intention to avail itself of the technical assistance of the Office to ensure that the committee is operational, the Committee hopes that such assistance will be provided in the near future. The Committee expresses the firm hope that the abovementioned draft Order will be adopted as soon as possible and requests the Government to keep it informed of any developments in this regard. It therefore once again requests the Government to provide specific information on the content, frequency and outcome of the tripartite consultations held on all of the matters relating to international labour standards covered by the Convention, including questionnaires concerning items on the agenda of the Conference (Article 5(1)(a)), the proposals to be made in connection with the submission of instruments adopted by the Conference to the National Assembly (Article 5(1)(b)), the re-examination at appropriate intervals of unratified Conventions and of Recommendations to which effect has not yet been given (Article 5(1)(c)), reports to be made on the application of ratified Conventions (Article 5(1)(d)) and proposals for the denunciation of ratified Conventions (Article 5(1)(e)). The Committee also requests the Government to provide information on the outcome of the meetings organized by the Ministry of Labour on the matters relating to international labour standards.

The Committee notes with concern that the Government’s report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments initially made in 2013.

Effective tripartite consultations. The Government indicates that the trade union and employers’ elections held between October 2008 and July 2009 enabled 12 occupational organizations of workers to be identified as being the most representative, with terms of office lasting until the next elections, scheduled for December 2013. The most representative occupational organizations of employers are determined on the basis of the number of enterprises affiliated. The Government also indicates that the Ministry of Employment, Labour and Social Welfare convenes sittings of the National Council on Labour (CNT) by an order that it issues to the social partners represented in the CNT, requesting them to submit the names of the titular and alternate representatives of their respective organizations (Article 3 of the Convention). The Committee notes that the Government’s report contains no further information on the operation of the consultation procedures required by the Convention. The Committee refers the Government to its previous observation, in which it points to a serious failure of the obligation to submit the instruments adopted by the Conference, laid down in article 19(5) and (6) of the ILO Constitution. It requests the Government to provide information on the consultation procedures held with the social partners on the proposals made to Parliament upon the submission of instruments adopted by the Conference (Article 5(1)(b) of the Convention). It further requests the Government to provide detailed information on the content of the consultations and the recommendations made by the social partners on each of the matters listed in Article 5(1) of the Convention.

The Committee expects that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

El Salvador

Follow-up to the conclusions of the Committee on the Application of Standards (International Labour Conference, 107th Session, May–June 2018)

The Committee notes the discussion that took place in the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards in June 2018 concerning the application of the Convention, in which the Conference Committee noted with concern the dysfunctional operation of social dialogue in the country and the non-compliance with the Convention. The Conference Committee therefore called upon the Government to: (i) refrain from interfering with the constitution of employers’ organizations and to facilitate, in accordance with national law, the proper representation of legitimate employers’ organizations by issuing appropriate credentials; (ii) develop, in consultation with the social partners, clear, objective, predictable and legally binding rules for the reactivation and full functioning of the Higher Labour Council (CST); (iii) reactivate, without delay, the CST, through the most representative organizations of workers and employers and through social dialogue in order to ensure its full functioning; (iv) appoint without delay representatives of the most representative employers’ organizations in the CST where such appointments are still pending; and (v) avail itself of ILO technical assistance. It also recommended that the Government submit a detailed report for examination at the next session of the Committee of Experts.

The Committee also notes the observations of the National Business Association (ANEP) and the International Organisation of Employers (IOE), received on 11 September 2018, alleging non-compliance with the Convention by the Government.
Articles 2 and 3(1) of the Convention. Adequate procedures. Election of the representatives of the social partners to the CST. In reply to its previous comments, the Committee notes that the Government’s report refers to the intervention of a Government representative at the 107th Session of the Conference Committee in June 2018. The Government representative expressed her view that the case had been recognized by the Committee of Experts as a case of progress as a result of the actions taken by the Government to reactivate the CST. With regard to the allegations of Government interference in the appointment of workers’ representatives to the CST and the National Minimum Wage Council, made by the ANEP, the Government representative denied them and referred to acts of interference by the ANEP, stating that the ANEP should not interfere in the appointment of worker members. The Government representative added that other tripartite bodies in which the ANEP participated on a permanent basis and without interference operated normally. In this regard, the Government representative referred to various measures adopted on a tripartite basis in the National Minimum Wage Council, the Housing Social Fund (SFV) and the Salvadoran Vocational Training Institute (INSAFORP).

The Committee also notes the observations of the IOE and the ANEP indicating that the Government is continuing to fail to engage in genuine dialogue and is not holding tripartite consultations, thereby failing to comply with the recommendations and resolutions issued by the ILO’s supervisory bodies. They maintain that, since the failed attempt to convene the CST in July 2015, the Government has not taken any measures for the reactivation of the CST, nor have legitimate representatives of the social partners on the CST been elected freely and independently and without Government interference. With reference to the Government’s indications that the ANEP refused to participate in the session of the CST held on 6 July 2017, the employers’ organizations allege that the convening of the meeting was unlawful and that, in contrast with the provisions of section 3 of the Rules of the CST, the President of the CST (the Minister of Labour) convened the session unilaterally, without the agreement of the Vice-President nominated by the workers or the Vice-President nominated by the employers. With reference to the Government’s claim that the process of appointing workers’ representatives in the CST was undertaken publicly with the representatives of workers and employers, the employers’ organizations indicate that the election was undertaken directly by the Government based on election criteria that even the workers’ organizations indicated that they were not aware of during the direct contacts mission which visited the country in July 2017. The Committee also notes the allegation by the employers’ organizations that no sessions of the CST were held between December 2016 and July 2017, but that it was in practice the Higher National Minimum Wage Council which held its sessions during that period. In that regard, they emphasize that the election of the representatives to the Higher National Minimum Wage Council was carried out based on rules issued by the Minister of Labour who, under the terms of the legislation in El Salvador, is not empowered to issue such instructions. The employers’ organizations indicate that they have appealed against those rules to the Supreme Court of Justice calling for them to be set aside. They also refer to the Government’s claim that the various tripartite bodies in the country are fully operational. In this regard, they affirm that they are in full operation, but only due to the fact that it was the Government itself, on the basis of the legal reforms adopted in 19 of the bodies in August 2012, which appointed the employers’ representatives to the Executive Boards of the bodies. These reforms were declared unconstitutional by the Supreme Court of Justice in November 2016. In particular, they refer to interference by the Government in, among other bodies, the General Electricity and Telecommunications Supervisory Body (SIGET), the regulatory body for electricity and telecommunications in the country. They allege that the Government interfered in the nomination by employers’ organizations of a titular director and a substitute director in the SIGET through the creation over a short period of time of 60 fictitious employers’ associations which participated in the elections. They indicate that these facts have been denounced to the Chamber of the Constitutional Court, which has ordered precautionary measures, and the Prosecutor-General of the Republic for the corresponding criminal investigations. The Committee further notes the indication by the employers’ organizations of other cases which illustrate the Government’s lack of commitment to promoting social dialogue, such as the development between July and August 2017 of a decent work policy without the participation of the social partners, and the presentation in May 2018 of the National Employment Pact, for the revision of which the ANEP was only allowed two working hours. The Committee also notes that the employers’ organizations denounced attacks against the premises of the ANEP on 30 August 2018. The Committee firmly trusts that the Government will take the necessary measures to promote and reinforce tripartism and genuine social dialogue with a view to ensuring the operation of the Higher Labour Council. The Committee once again urges the Government to establish without delay, in prior consultation with the social partners, clear and transparent rules for the nomination of workers’ representatives to the CST that comply with the criterion of representativity. The committee requests the Government to provide its comments and information in response to the ANEP’s allegations of interference and attacks against ANEP offices. In addition, the Committee trusts that the Government will take the necessary measures to investigate and resolve this matter. The Committee requests the Government to keep it informed of any developments in this respect.

Article 5(1). Effective tripartite consultations. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to keep it informed of the outcome of the tripartite consultations held on the proposals to be submitted to the Legislative Assembly with regard to the submission of 58 instruments adopted by the Conference between 1976 and 2015. The Committee notes the Government’s indication that, with the support of the cooperation provided by the ILO within the framework of the project of the Generalized System of Preferences (GSP) of the European Union, a draft was adopted of a “Protocol on the submission procedure”. The Government indicates that on 2 May 2018 the draft Protocol was communicated to the competent bodies for consultation. The bodies required legal consultations with a view to identifying the commitments and implications of the submission process. The Government adds that, once the final proposed Protocol has been adopted, it will also be sent to the social partners for consultation. The Committee also notes that the ANEP maintains that it has not received the reports on ratified Conventions that are to be sent by the Government under article 23 of the Constitution. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the outcome of the tripartite consultations held in relation to the Protocol on the submission procedure, and to provide a copy of the Protocol when it has been adopted. The Committee also requests the Government to provide updated information on the content and outcome of the tripartite consultations held on all the matters relating to international labour standards covered by Article 5(1)(a)-(e) of the Convention.

Technical assistance. In reply to the Committee’s previous comments, the Government indicates that, in the context of ILO technical assistance, in June and July 2018 various workshops were held separately with representatives of the Government, workers’ organizations and employers’ organizations with a view to identifying points of agreement relating to the reform or proposal of new rules of the CST as a means of bringing to an end the inactivity of this tripartite body. The Government adds that, in accordance with the recommendations contained in the report of the direct contacts mission carried out in July 2017, support was also requested for the consultations to be held with workers and employers for purposes of formulating legislative reforms proposing to extend freedom of association rights and to develop and promote social dialogue. In this respect, the Government indicates that a first round of consultations has been undertaken with workers with a view to developing a proposed reform of the Labour Code. Finally, the Government indicates that the planned activities will be continued in the months to come in the context of the follow up to the recommendations of the direct contacts mission. The Committee requests the Government to continue providing detailed information on the measures adopted in the framework of ILO technical assistance, and on their outcome.

Grenada

The Committee notes that the Government’s report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments initially made in 2016.

Article 5 of the Convention. Effective tripartite consultations. The Committee recalls that, in its previous comment, it had requested the Government to provide detailed information on each of the tripartite consultations held on matters concerning international labour standards covered by the Convention. The Government indicates in its report that tripartism is working well in the country to the extent that it has moved towards establishing a Committee of Social Partners. The said Committee includes civil society organizations and the conference of churches; it is responsible for the monitoring of the IMF Structural Adjustment Programme 2014–16 in Grenada, including labour reforms. Additionally, the Government specifies that a comprehensive review of the Labour Code was conducted during the 2014–15 period. Moreover, the Government recalls that, pursuant to section 21(2) of the Employment Act, the functions of the Labour Advisory Board reflect the provisions of Article 5(1) of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to provide detailed information on the activities of the Labour Advisory Board on the tripartite consultations on international labour standards covered by the Convention, including full particulars on the consultations held on each of the matters listed in Article 5(1) of the Convention. The Government is also requested to indicate the intervals at which the abovementioned consultations are held, and the nature of the participation by the social partners during these consultations.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Guatemala

Articles 2 and 5 of the Convention. Effective tripartite consultations. In reply to its previous comments, the Committee notes the detailed information provided by the Government in its report on the holding of tripartite consultations between 2015 and August 2018 in the Tripartite Committee on International Labour Affairs on each of the subjects relating to international labour standards required by the Convention. The subjects covered during the consultations included the examination of the possible ratification of the Domestic Workers Convention, 2011 (No. 189), and the Part-Time Work Convention, 1994 (No. 175). In this regard, the Committee notes with interest that the ratification of Convention No. 175 was registered on 28 February 2017. The Government also reports the holding of tripartite consultations on: ILO technical cooperation activities, the resolutions and conclusions of ILO supervisory bodies and the promotion of greater knowledge of ILO activities, in accordance with Paragraph 6 of Recommendation No. 152. Finally, the Committee notes the reference by the Government to the establishment of the Tripartite Labour Relations and Freedom of Association Commission under the terms of Ministerial Decision No. 45-2018 of the Ministry of Labour and Social Welfare, in accordance with the requests of the ILO supervisory bodies in the context of the examination of the complaint made in 2012 under article 26 of the ILO Constitution concerning non-compliance with the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87). The Committee requests the Government to continue providing detailed and updated information on the consultations held on each of the subjects relating to international labour standards covered by Article 5(1)(a)–(e) of the Convention. The Committee also requests the Government to keep it informed of any developments in the possible ratification of Convention No. 189.

Ireland

Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144) (ratification: 1979)

Article 5 of the Convention. Effective tripartite consultations. In response to the Committee’s previous comments, the Government indicates that its reply to the General Survey on social protection floors (2019) was transmitted to the Irish Business and Employers’ Confederation (IBEC) and the Irish Congress of Trade Unions (ICTU), who were invited to send their comments back to the Government or directly to the ILO. The Committee notes the establishment of the ILO Interdepartmental Group in 2017, which includes the social partners and deals with ILO-related matters such as the prospect of ratifying unratified conventions. The Government adds that the ILO Interdepartmental Group held six meetings from March 2017 to September 2018. Regarding proposals to be made to the competent authority, the Government indicates that the Department of Business, Enterprise and Innovation (DBEI) is currently consulting with IBEC and the ICTU, through meetings and discussions held in the ILO Interdepartmental Group, on the proposed ratification of the Protocol of 2014 to the Forced Labour Convention, 1930. It adds that discussions are also ongoing, with the participation of both social partners, on the proposed Convention and Recommendation on ending violence and harassment in the world of work, in view of the 2019 International Labour Conference. The Government indicates that unratified Conventions and Recommendations are also reviewed at appropriate intervals. It adds that, even though no proposals to denounce ratified Conventions have arisen since its last report, any denunciation of a ratified Convention would involve consultations with the social partners. Regarding reports to be made under Article 22 of the ILO Constitution, the Government indicates that the DBEI forwards copies of all reports to IBEC and the ICTU, who are invited to provide their comments either to the DBEI or directly to the ILO. The Committee welcomes the information provided and requests the Government to provide updated information on the activities of the ILO Interdepartmental Group and to indicate the manner, frequency and outcome of tripartite consultations relevant to the Convention. It also requests the Government to continue to provide full particulars on the content and outcome of the consultations held on each of the matters related to international labour standards listed in Article 5(1) of the Convention. More particularly, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the outcome of the consultations held on the proposed ratification of the Protocol of 2014 to the Forced Labour Convention, 1930.

Jamaica

The Committee notes that the Government’s report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments initially made in 2015.

Article 5 of the Convention. Effective tripartite consultations. The Committee notes from the report that, in addition to the Domestic Workers Convention, 2011 (No. 189), the Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 1981 (No. 155), is being considered by the Labour Advisory Committee (LAC). It also notes that the LAC met on a yearly basis in 2012–14 and, since the start of 2015, there have been three LAC meetings. The Government reiterates that the matters relating to Article 5 of the Convention are not usually individually addressed at LAC meetings. The Government adds that, from time to time, particular issues concerning international labour standards are addressed by different members of the LAC, although not in the committee setting. The Committee requests the Government to provide detailed information on the content and outcome of the tripartite consultations held by the LAC on each of the matters listed in Article 5(1) of the Convention, including replies to questionnaires concerning items on the agenda of the International Labour Conference and comments on proposed texts to be discussed by the Conference, proposals to be made to Parliament in connection with the submission of instruments adopted by the Conference, and questions arising out of reports to be made on the application of ratified Conventions under article 22 of the ILO Constitution.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Madagascar

Articles 2 and 5 of the Convention. Effective tripartite consultations. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to provide detailed information on the subjects and outcome of the tripartite consultations held on each of the items set out in Article 5(1). The Government indicates that it is making efforts to ensure compliance with the obligations deriving from the Conventions that it has ratified, including Convention No. 144, and recognizes that tripartite consultations on international labour standards were not undertaken effectively. However, it emphasizes that significant improvements have been implemented following a workshop to strengthen capacities on international labour standards and for the preparation of reports organized by the ILO on 22 and 23 October 2016. In 2016, the Government replied to the Committee’s comments on Conventions Nos 29, 87, 98, 100, 105, 111 and 182. It adds that, although the social partners were consulted before the final replies were sent, they made no observations in that regard. In 2017, the Government replied to the Committee’s comments concerning Conventions Nos 6, 26, 81, 87, 88, 95, 97, 98, 124, 129, 159 and 173. Following the tripartite consultations held, the observations made by the most representative workers’ organizations were included in the final replies. With regard to the re-examination of unratified Conventions and of Recommendations to which effect has not yet been given, the Government indicates that tripartite consultations have been held on 11 instruments respecting working time (Conventions Nos 1, 30, 47, 106 and 175 and Recommendations Nos 13, 98, 103, 116, 178 and 182). The Government adds that it sent its replies to the most representative organizations of employers and workers, but that the Trade Union Confederation of Malagasy Revolutionary Workers (FISEMARE) was the only one to provide comments on this subject. It adds that, between 28 February and 1 March 2017, the Ministry of Labour organized, with ILO support, a tripartite workshop to validate the situation with regard to the Labour Relations (Public Service) Convention, 1978 (No. 151). This review was validated unanimously by the representatives of the three partners present. Furthermore, a steering committee to promote Convention No. 151 was established to follow the process of ratification and engage in advocacy with the competent authorities, including the Government and Parliament. The Government adds that it has responded to the abrogation of Conventions Nos 21, 50, 64, 65, 86 and 104 and to the withdrawal of Recommendations Nos 7, 61 and 62, included on the agenda of the 107th Session of the International Labour Conference in 2018. It specifies that these responses were communicated to the most representative social partners, but that the latter made no observations on this subject. In its 2000 General Survey, Tripartite Consultation International Labour Standards, paragraph 71, the Committee recalls that Paragraph 23(3) of the Tripartite Consultation (Activities of the International Labour Organisation) Recommendation, 1976 (No. 152), specifies that consultations may only be undertaken through written communications, “where those involved in the consultative procedures are agreed that such communications are appropriate and sufficient”. The Committee notes with interest that the Government, with ILO support, organized a workshop on 12, 13 and 14 September 2017 to validate the comparative study of the legislation in force and the provisions of the Maritime Labour Convention, 2006 (MLC, 2006), and the Work in Fishing Convention, 2007 (No. 188), with a view to their ratification. It adds that two roadmaps on the ratification of the MLC, 2006, and Convention No. 188 were unanimously approved by the tripartite partners present. The Committee requests the Government to provide updated information on the manner in which it ensures effective tripartite consultations, as well as on the content and outcome of the tripartite consultations held on each of the issues covered by Article 5(1). It also requests the Government to keep it informed of any developments relating to the ratification of Conventions Nos 151, 188 and the MLC, 2006.

Article 3. Choice of the representatives of employers and workers by their respective organizations. The Committee notes that the implementation of Decree No. 2011-490 on trade union organizations and representativity implies for the tripartite partners the implementation of various types of action, including the holding of elections for staff delegates at the enterprise level within the territory of Madagascar by the Ministry of Labour, the convening of the social partners for an indication of the provisional results, and the consolidation by ministerial order of the definitive results for national and regional representation. The Government indicates that, in accordance with this process, the elections of staff representatives were launched in 2014 throughout Madagascar. It adds that Order No. 34-2015 to determine trade union representativity for 2014 and 2015 was adopted and was issued in February 2014. However, the Order has been contested by certain workers’ organizations, including the General Confederation of Malagasy Trade Unions (FISEMA), FISEMARE and the Revolutionary Malagasy Union (SEREMA), challenging the outcome of the ballot, which placed the Christian Confederation of Malagasy Trade Unions (SEKRIMA) first among the most representative unions at the national level. In March 2015, these unions lodged an appeal for the result to be set aside. The Government explains that, as the appeal was suspensive in its effect, the application of the Order was suspended until the court issued its ruling rejecting the appeal in 2017. Moreover, as the establishment of the various labour-related bodies is conditional upon representativity, as they involve tripartite representation, such as in the case of inter-enterprise medical services management councils and the executive council of the National Social Insurance Fund (CNAPS), the tripartite actors concerned agreed to adopt an alternative solution. In this context, the Government indicates that all the representatives of the various organizations appointed to the different social dialogue structures in existence, and the labour-related bodies referred to above, were subject to tacit renewal of their mandates. The Committee requests the Government to make every effort, in consultation with the social partners, to ensure that tripartism and social dialogue are promoted so as to facilitate procedures that guarantee effective tripartite consultations (Articles 2 and 3). In this respect, it requests the Government to provide updated information on any developments relating to the choice of employers’ and workers’ representatives for the purposes of the procedures covered by the Convention, including the dates and organization of their elections. The Committee also requests the Government to provide a copy of the Order that is in force with its next report.
Malawi

Tripartite consultations required by the Convention. The Committee refers to its previous observations and invites the Government to submit a report containing detailed information on the tripartite consultations held on each of the matters related to international labour standards covered by Article 5(1) of the Convention. It also requests the Government to include information on the nature of any reports or recommendations made as a result of such consultations.

Article 5(1)(c) and (e) of the Convention. Prospects of ratification of Conventions and proposals for the denunciation of ratified Conventions. In reply to the Committee’s previous comments, the Government indicates that it will consult with the social partners regarding the denunciation of Conventions Nos 50, 64, 65, 86, 104 and 107. The Committee recalls that the ILO’s Governing Body recommended the denunciation of Conventions Nos 50, 64, 65, 86, 104 and 107 concerning indigenous workers and the ratification of the most updated instrument, the Indigenous and Tribal Peoples Convention, 1989 (No. 169). In the Committee’s 2010 direct request on the Underground Work (Women) Convention, 1935 (No. 45), the Committee noted that the Tripartite Labour Advisory Council approved the denunciation of Convention No. 45 and that the Government was consulting with the social partners on the possible ratification of the Safety and Health in Mines Convention, 1995 (No. 176). The Committee invites the Government to include in its next report information on the progress achieved to re-examine unratiﬁed Conventions – such as Conventions Nos 169 and 176 – in order to promote, as appropriate, their implementation or ratification and to denounce outdated Conventions.

The Committee expects that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Nigeria

Article 1 of the Convention. Consultations with representative organizations. Since 2012, the Committee has repeatedly requested the Government to report on the results of the legislative reform and its impact on the improvement of consultations with representative organizations that enjoy freedom of association, as required under this Convention. In this context, the Committee has also consistently reminded the Government that it is important for employers’ and workers’ organizations to enjoy the right to freedom of association, without which there could be no effective system of tripartite consultation. In its response, the Government refers to the National Labour Advisory Council (NLAC), as the institutionalized tripartite body established in compliance with the provisions and requirements of the Convention. It adds that consultations with the social partners are ongoing, with the aim of advancing the revision of the national labour legislation. In this regard, the Committee notes the Government’s indication that a stakeholder meeting was held on 18 April 2018 under the auspices of the ILO Office in Abuja. The Government adds that the stakeholders also participated in a public hearing before the National Assembly on 23 April 2018. The Committee expresses the firm hope that the pending legislative reforms will be finalized without further delay. It reiterates its request that the Government report on the results of the reform and its impact on the improvement of consultations with representative organizations that enjoy freedom of association, as required under this Convention. It also requests the Government to indicate the outcome of the meetings held with the stakeholders in April 2018 in relation to the reforms, and to provide a copy of the relevant legislation once it is adopted.

Article 5(1). Tripartite consultations required by the Convention. The Government indicates that tripartite consultations are used to respond to the questionnaires relating to items on the agenda of the International Labour Conference (ILC). The Committee notes that an interactive session for Nigeria’s tripartite delegation to the 107th session of the ILC was held on 14 and 15 May 2018, to discuss the items on the ILC agenda. The Government adds that a practical tripartite workshop on reporting was held on 26 and 27 June 2018, to assist with meeting Nigeria’s reporting obligations under article 22 of the ILO Constitution. The Government indicates that effective tripartite consultations will continue to be held on proposals made to the National Assembly. The Committee notes the Government’s indication that the representative organizations were consulted with regard to the Special Maritime Session of the NLAC for the ratification of the MLC, 2006 held in February 2013, which led to its ratification in June 2013. In addition, a tripartite technical committee of maritime stakeholders on seafarers held a meeting on 26 February 2014 to discuss a joint proposal related to international labour standards covered by Article 5(1)(e) of the MLC 2006. The resolutions at this meeting led the Government to convene a meeting of technical experts of the NLAC on the amendment of the Code of the MLC 2006 to articulate Nigeria’s tripartite position in support of the amendment. The Committee welcomes the information provided and requests the Government to provide full and detailed information on the content and outcome of tripartite consultations held on all matters concerning international labour standards covered by the Convention, including consultations relating to the questionnaires: on Conference agenda items (Article 5(1)(a)); proposals to be made to the competent authorities in connection with the submission of Conventions and Recommendations pursuant to article 19 of the ILO Constitution (Article 5(1)(b)); the re-examination at appropriate intervals of unratiﬁed Conventions and Recommendations to which effect has not yet been given (Article 5(1)(c)); questions arising out of reports to be presented on the application of ratified Conventions (Article 5(1)(d)); and proposals concerning the possible denunciation of ratified Conventions (Article 5(1)(e)).

Article 6. Operation of the consultative procedures. The Government indicates that the representative organizations have been consulted in accordance with Article 6. The Committee once again requests the Government to indicate whether, in accordance with Article 6, the representative organizations have been consulted in the preparation of an annual report on the working of the consultation procedures provided for in the Convention and, if so, to indicate the outcome of these consultations.

The Committee expects that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Serbia

Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976
(No. 144) (ratification: 2005)

Follow-up to the conclusions of the Committee on the Application of Standards

The Committee recalls that the Conference Committee, at its June 2018 session, recommended that the national authorities take the necessary and appropriate measures to ensure effective and efficient tripartite consultation of the national social partners in implementation of Convention No. 144. It further recommended that the Government take the necessary steps to ensure that meaningful, effective and timely consultations on matters concerning international labour standards take place, including within the framework of the Social and Economic Council of the Republic of Serbia. The Conference Committee also requested the Government to report on the issues discussed and the frequency of tripartite consultations to the Committee of Experts before its November 2018 session. It invited the Government to avail itself of ILO technical assistance in relation to the conclusions.

Articles 2 and 5 of the Convention. Effective tripartite consultations. The Committee notes that the Government’s report has not been received. The Committee nevertheless understands that the Government has made a request for technical assistance in relation to the application of the Convention. In this regard, the ILO is providing technical support for a tripartite workshop to be held in January 2019. The Committee requests the Government to report on the outcome of the planned tripartite workshop. It also urges the Government to continue its efforts to take effective and time-bound measures to ensure effective tripartite consultations in conformity with the provisions of the Convention, and to report on the nature, content and frequency of consultations in relation to the matters within the scope of Article 5(1)(a)–(e) of the Convention.

Sierra Leone

Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976
(No. 144) (ratification: 1985)

The Committee notes with deep concern that the Government’s report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments initially made in 2004.

Effective tripartite consultations. The Committee notes the Government’s report supplied in June 2004 indicating its commitment to promote tripartite consultation throughout the country as well as supporting the tripartite delegation to the International Labour Conference. The Committee hopes that the Government and the social partners will examine how the Convention is applied and that the Government’s next report will contain indications on any measures taken in order to implement effective tripartite consultation in the sense of the Convention (Articles 2 and 5 of the Convention).

The Committee recalls that the Office has the technical capacity to help strengthen social dialogue and support the activities that governments and employers’ and workers’ organizations undertake for the consultations required by the Convention.

The Committee expects that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela

Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976
(No. 144) (ratification: 1983)

The Committee notes the observations of the Independent Trade Union Alliance Confederation of Workers
(CTASI), received on 28 May and 29 August 2018. The Committee also notes the observations of the International Organisation of Employers (IOE) and the Federation of Chambers and Associations of Commerce and Production of Venezuela (FEDECAMARAS), received on 1 September 2018.

The Committee recalls that, at its 329th Session (March 2017), the Governing Body declared admissible a complaint concerning non-observance by the Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela of the Minimum Wage-Fixing Machinery Convention, 1928 (No. 26), the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No.
87), and the Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144), made under article 26 of the ILO Constitution by several Employers’ delegates to the 104th Session (2015) of the International Labour Conference, and at its 332nd Session (March 2018), the Governing Body decided that a commission of inquiry would be established. In these circumstances, and in accordance with usual practice which suspends the functioning of the supervisory machinery during the period of operation of a commission of inquiry, the Committee will renew its supervision of the application of the Convention in the Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela once the commission has concluded its work.

Labour administration and inspection

Albania

Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) (ratification: 2004)

The Committee notes that the Government’s report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments initially made in 2017.

In order to provide a comprehensive view of the issues relating to the application of the ratified Conventions on labour inspection, the Committee considers it appropriate to examine Convention No. 81 and Convention No. 129 together.

Articles 3(1)(a) and (b) and (2), and 14 of Convention No. 81 and Articles 6(1)(a) and (b) and (3), and 19 of Convention No. 129. Labour inspection activities in the area of occupational safety and health (OSH) in agriculture. The Committee notes the Government’s indication, in reply to its previous request, that the number of inspections in the agricultural sector has remained at 0.8 per cent of total inspections. The Committee notes in this regard that, as indicated in the Government’s Occupational Safety and Health Policy Document and Action Plan (2016–20), nearly half of the workforce in Albania is employed in the agricultural sector. The Committee also notes the Government’s indication that no training has yet taken place for inspectors on agriculture-related subjects. The Committee once again requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken to secure the enforcement of laws and regulations in agriculture, including with respect to OSH, and to continue to provide information on the number of inspections carried out in that sector. The Committee requests the Government to report on training for labour inspectors on agriculture-related subjects, specifying the subjects, duration, participation and outcomes.

Article 6 of Convention No. 81 and Article 8 of Convention No. 129. Conditions of service. The Committee previously noted the information in the 2009 ILO audit report on labour inspection services that the remuneration for labour inspectors was not attractive and that there was no real human resources strategy for recruitment and career development. The Committee notes the copy of Decision No. 726 of 21 December 2000 on salaries of employees of budgetary institutions provided with the Government’s report, which breaks down the monthly salaries of civil servants. The Committee requests the Government to indicate whether any measures have been adopted since the 2009 ILO audit report to improve the remuneration scale and career prospects of labour inspectors in relation to other comparable categories of public officials, and requests the Government for clarification regarding the actual remuneration scale and career prospects of labour inspectors in relation to other comparable categories of government employees exercising similar functions, such as tax inspectors or police officers.

Articles 10, 11 and 16 of Convention No. 81 and Articles 14, 15 and 21 of Convention No. 129. Staffing and material means of the labour inspection services; scope of inspections carried out. The Committee previously noted the Government’s indication that 167 labour inspectors were not sufficient to fully perform the inspection tasks required by law. The Committee notes the Government’s indication in its report that the number of labour inspectors employed by the State Labour Inspectorate and Social Services (SLISS) is currently 155 employees, with 37 at the central level and 118 employees at the regional level. The Committee further notes that the Government reports that the regional offices still do not have sufficient office equipment, that the SLISS has only eight vehicles (for 12 regions) and that funds are insufficient for the reimbursement of labour inspectors performing their duties. It notes in this respect the Government’s indication in its report submitted under the Promotional Framework for Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 2006 (No. 187), that the main problem for labour inspection is the lack of financial resources, which limits the ability of inspectors to travel to entities that should be inspected. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the budget allocated to labour inspection is sufficient to secure the effective discharge of the duties of the inspectorate, given the decrease in the number of labour inspection staff and the continuing inadequacy of equipment and vehicles. The Committee also requests the Government to continue to provide information on the staffing and material means of the SLISS in performing inspections in agriculture, including transportation and local offices.

Article 12(1) of Convention No. 81 and Article 16(1) of Convention No. 129. Right of inspectors to free entry of workplaces. The Committee notes the Government’s indication that 90 per cent of inspections are conducted pursuant to a predetermined plan that is developed in cooperation with labour inspectors using the e-inspection portal, with the approval of the regional directorate of inspection. While the remaining 10 per cent of inspections are unscheduled and/or emergency inspections, which can be undertaken without authorization or notification, the Government reports that an authorizing officer shall issue an authorization within 24 hours. The Government indicates that labour inspectors are provided with cards so that they can identify themselves when entering workplaces and conducting inspection operations. The Committee observes that where only 10 per cent of all inspections are unscheduled and/or responding to emergency circumstances, this may undermine the effectiveness of predetermined scheduled inspections because problems may be concealed and thus remain undetected. The Committee requests the Government to indicate the procedure by which the authorizing officer must issue an authorization, and the consequences for the inspection if the authorization is not issued within the 24-hour time frame provided. In addition, the Committee requests the Government to indicate how often the 10 per cent of unscheduled and/or emergency inspections actually take place within 24 hours, how often they take place without advance notification, and how often they result in findings of violations or unsafe conditions.

Articles 5(a), 17 and 18 of Convention No. 81 and Articles 12(1), 22 and 24 of Convention No. 129. Prosecutions and penalties. The Committee noted, in its previous comments, that the number of fines imposed was relatively low (in 2011, 381 imposed in relation to over 14,000 inspections). In this respect, the Committee notes the Government’s indication that Law No. 10279 of 2010 “on Administrative Offences” is used in conjunction with section 48 of Law No. 10433 “on Inspection” to provide appropriate administrative penalties where an infringement is detected during the inspection process. The Government indicates that the law aims to provide fair and equal treatment and non-discriminatory rules to be applied by inspectors. The Government emphasizes that the main purpose of the policy pursued by the SLISS is to reduce the number of fines in a rational way, by focusing on prevention and awareness raising concerning safety and health at work rather than penalties. In addition, while the Committee noted in 2013 that it was not required for the labour inspectorate to pay an advance for the enforcement of fines.
issued, the Committee notes that the Government indicates that the SLISS repaid penalties in the amount of 11,487,713 Albanian lek (ALL) (approximately US$101,780) in 2014 and ALL4,070,255 (approximately US$46,060) from January to May 2015. Noting that the policy pursued by the SLISS intends to reduce the number of fines in a rational way, the Committee once again requests the Government to provide information on the number and nature of fines imposed by virtue of labour inspections, the number of judicial executions launched for the enforcement of orders, as well as the number of accidents reported and violations detected during the reporting period. In addition, the Committee further requests information regarding the repayment of penalties by the SLISS, indicating the conditions for such repayment and the total amount of advance payments not reimbursed to the labour inspectorate.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Antigua and Barbuda

Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) (ratification: 1983)

Articles 3(2), 10 and 16 of the Convention. Functions and number of labour inspectors and frequency of inspection visits. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that according to a 2009 job description communicated by the Government, labour inspectors were obliged to carry out other functions in the Labour Department, in addition to their primary duties, as well as the functions assigned to them by their immediate supervisor, the Labour Commissioner or the Deputy Labour Commissioner. It also noted that from 1997 to 2010, there had been a high fluctuation in the number of labour inspections, with a decrease in the number of labour inspections from 2009 to 2010 of almost half (that is, from 248 to 128). The Committee notes the Government’s indication in its present report that the 2009 job description of labour inspectors remains valid and that unforeseen challenges had been the cause of the fluctuations and reductions in the number of labour inspections. The Committee requests that the Government provide detailed information on the current number of labour inspectors (including the number of labour inspectors specializing in occupational safety and health (OSH)), and an indication as to whether this number is sufficient to secure the effective discharge of the duties of the inspectorate. The Committee also requests that the Government provide information on whether any additional functions are entrusted to labour inspectors (such as the mediation and conciliation of labour disputes), as well as information on the measures taken to ensure that any further duties do not interfere with the effective discharge of the primary duties of labour inspectors.

Article 5(a) and (b). Cooperation between the labour inspection services and other government services or public institutions and collaboration with employers’ and workers’ organizations. The Committee again notes with regret that the Government has once again not provided the requested information on the details of collaboration between the labour inspectorate and the Ministry of Health (or information on any difficulties preventing such cooperation in practice). The Committee further notes that the Government has once again not provided the requested information on the details of collaboration between the labour inspectorate and the social partners. The Committee therefore once again requests that the Government provide detailed information on the measures taken to develop cooperation between the labour inspectorate and the Ministry of Health (such as on regular exchange of information and data, common training seminars or conferences). It also once again requests that the Government provide details on the content and modalities of any existing cooperation (such as the organization of conferences or joint committees, or similar bodies, to discuss questions concerning the enforcement of labour legislation and the health and safety of workers, and whether the labour inspectorate is represented on the National Labour Board).

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Bangladesh

Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) (ratification: 1972)

The Committee notes the observations of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), received on 1 September 2018.

Articles 2, 4 and 23 of the Convention. Labour inspection in export processing zones (EPZs) and special economic zones (SEZs). The Committee recalls its reiterated requests to bring export processing zones (EPZs) and special economic zones (SEZs) under the purview of the labour inspectorate. In this regard, the Committee notes the Government’s indication in its report that the draft EPZ Labour Act (which will also apply to SEZs) has been revisited with a view to including provisions on labour inspection by the national labour inspection service, along with the existing supervision exercised by the Bangladesh Export Processing Zones Authority (BEPZA). The Committee also notes that the ITUC criticizes that the new draft EPZ Labour Act continues to entrust the BEPZA with the supervision of labour standards in EPZs. The trade union adds that the BEPZA is an entity primarily interested in protecting investment and not addressing labour law violations of workers. The ITUC states in this respect that there should be no discrimination between workers inside and outside of the zones with respect to their rights. Noting with concern that it has now been more than four years since the request of the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards (CAS) on this matter, the Committee urges in the strongest terms that the Government complete its revised draft of the EPZ Labour Act in the very near future in order to bring EPZs and SEZs under the purview of the labour inspectorate.

Article 6. Status and conditions of service of labour inspectors. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that retaining labour inspectors within the labour inspection services was a problem and that a number of recently recruited labour inspectors had left the Department of Inspection for Factories and Establishments (DIFE), after having been trained, to take up work with other government services. It also noted that the labour inspection services offered less favourable career prospects than other government services and requested the Government to review the professional profiles and grades of labour inspectors to ensure that they reflect the career prospects of public servants exercising similar functions within other government services, such as tax inspectors or the police.

The Committee notes the Government’s information provided in a table in reply to the Committee’s request, which shows that the salary of (regular) labour inspectors and tax inspectors are equal, but that police officers receive the same salary as the Assistant Inspector-General (which is one of the highest professional grades in the labour inspection service). The Committee also notes the Government’s indication that a study on the reasons for the high attrition rate, recommended, among other things, the development of the competencies of labour inspection staff and the creation of more senior positions. The Committee requests the Government to provide additional information on the salary and benefit structure applicable to labour inspectors and public servants exercising similar functions within other government services (such as tax inspectors or the police) in the highest professional categories of those services, as well as information on any measures taken or envisaged to align the conditions of service with that of public servants exercising similar functions. It also requests the Government to provide information on the specific measures taken to implement the recommendations made in the study on the reasons for the high attrition rate, concerning the creation of more senior positions within the labour inspection services.

Articles 7, 10, 11 and 16. Human resources and material resources of the labour inspectorate. Frequency and thoroughness of labour inspections. In its past comments, the Committee welcomed the steady increase in the number of labour inspectors since the Rana Plaza tragedy in 2013. However, it notes with regret that the Government has not provided any new information on the progress made with the recruitment of labour inspectors for the filling of the 575 labour inspection positions approved in 2014. It further notes with concern that the number of labour inspectors decreased from 345 to 320 between 2017 and 2018. The Committee also notes the observations made by the ITUC that the effective enforcement of labour law continues to be absent due to the weakness of the labour inspection system, and that the frequency and quality of labour inspections remain insufficient. The trade union adds that the incidence of fatal occupational accidents remains high in the textile, ship-breaking and stone-crushing industries. The Committee urges the Government to continue to make every effort to recruit an adequate number of qualified labour inspectors, and to fill all of the 575 labour inspection posts that have already been approved in 2014. It requests the Government to continue to provide information on the current number of labour inspectors working at the DIFE, as well as on the number of labour inspection visits carried out, including specific information for those industries with high rates of occupational accidents. Noting the information provided by the Government in this respect, the Committee also requests the Government to continue to provide information on the budget, equipment and transport facilities available to the DIFE, and the training provided to labour inspectors.

Articles 12(1), 15(c) and 16. Inspections without previous notice. Duty of confidentiality in relation to complaints. In its previous comment, the Committee noted that in 2014, only 2.5 per cent of all inspections were random or complaints-driven inspections without prior notice. It emphasized that, in light of these extremely low numbers, both the duty of labour inspectors to maintain confidentiality that an inspection was made as a result of a complaint, and the efficiency of inspections, were put at risk. The Committee subsequently noted the Government’s indication that in 2016–17, the percentage of unannounced inspections (i.e. random or complaints-driven inspections implemented without prior notice) had increased to 20 per cent of all inspections, and that the codification of the duty to keep confidential the existence or source of a complaint could be considered in the context of the proposed review of the Bangladesh Labour Act (BLA). The Committee notes that the Government provides information on the total number of inspections and their results, but not the requested information on the results of unannounced inspection visits. The Committee further notes that the Government has not provided the requested information on any measures taken to codify the duty of confidentiality in the national legislation. The Committee once again urges the Government to consider codifying the duty of confidentiality, either in the context of the proposed review of the BLA or in other regulations or guidelines concerning labour inspection, for the purpose of legal certainty. It also requests the Government to provide information on the number of inspection visits that were unannounced and those that were undertaken with prior notice, and once again requests information on the outcomes of unannounced inspections covering investigations of accidents or addressing complaints, including the nature of resolutions reached, violations identified and sanctions applied.

Articles 17 and 18. Legal proceedings, effective enforcement and sufficiently dissuasive penalties. The Committee notes the information provided by the Government, in reply to the Committee’s request for statistics, on the number of inspections undertaken and violations detected in the 2017–18 fiscal year (39,710 inspections and 257,904 violations). It notes that in the same period, 1,689 cases were submitted to the labour courts of which 781 were resolved. The Committee notes with concern that the amount of penalties imposed until May 2018 was Bangladesh Taka (BDT) 2.85 million (approximately US$3,401), which based on the number of cases resolved, appears to be quite low (an average of approximately US$5 per resolution). The Committee also notes the information provided by the Government, in response to its request, that there is one legal officer at the DIFE responsible for the follow-up of labour law violations detected by labour inspectors, that a legal advisory firm is affiliated with the DIFE, and that there is a plan to establish a
The Committee also notes the Government’s indication that the political and military difficulties that arose in 2012 continue to have a negative impact on several reform projects under way. While taking due note of the difficult situation in the country, the Committee requests the Government to continue its efforts to address the difficulties identified and to guarantee the effectiveness of the system, including by taking the necessary measures to provide labour inspectors with the means necessary for the effective performance of their duties. Recalling that the provision of transport facilities by the means necessary for the effective performance of their duties. Recalling that the provision of transport facilities by

The Committee notes in this regard the information provided by the Government in its response to the Committee’s request for information on the measures taken or envisaged to ensure that any additional duties assigned to labour inspectors do not interfere with the exercise of their primary duties. It further requests the Government to provide information on the steps taken in this regard and on the time and resources spent by labour inspectors on their various duties.

Central African Republic

Article 3(2) of the Convention. Duties of labour inspectors. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that a third of labour inspectors had supervisory duties and that, under the Labour Code, labour inspectors were responsible for the conciliation of collective and individual labour disputes. It asked the Government to provide an estimate of the time spent on the primary functions as set out in Article 3(1) of the Convention as compared to the other functions of the labour inspectorate. In this regard, the Committee observes that, according to the technical memorandum on the National Strategy for the Development and Modernization of the Labour Administration System of the Central African Republic, prepared in 2017 with the support of the ILO and attached to the Government report, the conciliation of individual and collective labour disputes constitutes the majority of inspectors’ work. The Committee also notes that, under the Labour Code, inspectors are assigned other duties relating to the exercise of freedom of association and collective bargaining (such as registering trade unions, supervising elections of staff representatives, facilitating the conclusion of collective labour agreements and receiving advance notice of strikes and lockouts). The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken or envisaged to ensure that any additional duties assigned to labour inspectors do not interfere with the exercise of their primary duties. It further requests the Government to provide information on the steps taken in this regard and on the time and resources spent by labour inspectors on their various duties.

Articles 11 and 16. Material means and transport facilities placed at the disposal of labour inspectors and reimbursement of necessary expenses. Frequency of inspection visits and effectiveness of the system. In its previous comments, the Committee noted: (a) the persistent lack of material means placed at the disposal of the labour inspection services, including for offices and transport facilities, as well as for the reimbursement of necessary expenses; and (b) the infrequency of inspection visits. The Committee notes in this regard the information provided by the Government in its report on its efforts in 2017 to provide every Regional Directorate of Labour with a motorbike. The Government points out that the prefectoral services sometimes rely on employers to provide them with transportation and that the recently created prefectural services do not have their own facilities. The Committee also notes the information provided in the 2013 partial activity report of the Ministry of Labour, Employment, Vocational Training and Social Security, according to which various types of difficulties have hindered the effective realization of the objectives pursued by the General Directorate of Labour and Social Welfare, such as security problems and the plundering of the Directorate. The Committee also notes the Government’s indication that the political and military difficulties that arose in 2012 continue to have a negative impact on several reform projects under way. While taking due note of the difficult situation in the country, the Committee requests the Government to continue its efforts to address the difficulties identified and to guarantee the effectiveness of the system, including by taking the necessary measures to provide labour inspectors with the means necessary for the effective performance of their duties. Recalling that the provision of transport facilities by employers may pose problems relating to the principles of impartiality and independence of labour inspectors, the Committee also requests the Government to continue its efforts to furnish labour inspectors with the transport facilities necessary for the performance of their duties, in accordance with Article 11(b) of the Convention.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee notes with deep concern that the Government’s report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments initially made in 2011.

Abuse of practical information to enable the Committee to assess the operation of the labour inspectorate in relation to the provisions of the Convention and relevant national laws. The Committee notes the updated information regarding the number and geographical distribution by category of labour inspection staff. It notes, by comparison with the data given in the report received from the Government in 2008, a substantial reduction in labour inspection staff, in particular labour inspectors (from 75 to 55) and principal controllers (from 96 to 72). The Committee recalls that, according to Article 10, in order to secure the effective discharge of the duties of the labour inspectorate, the number of labour inspectors must be determined with due regard to the importance of the duties which inspectors have to perform, in particular the number, nature, size and situation of the workplaces liable to inspection; the number and classes of workers employed in such workplaces; the number and complexity of the legal provisions to be enforced; the material means placed at the disposal of the inspectors; and the practical conditions under which visits of inspection must be carried out.

While the laws and regulations concerning labour inspection and its mandate and prerogatives are available, it must be noted that there are no numerical data on other areas defined in Article 10 and, as the Government admits, there are no specific measures for giving effect to the provisions of Article 11 concerning the material conditions of work of labour inspectors, who do not have access to the transport facilities required for them to carry out their duties. The Committee notes, on the other hand, that according to the Government, inspectors’ travel and related costs are reimbursed by the competent authority on presentation of invoices, which was not always the case, according to the report received in 2008.

The Committee once again requests the Government to provide in its next report all the available information needed to assess the application of the Convention in law and in practice. This information should cover, among other matters: (i) the up-to-date geographical distribution of public officials responsible for labour inspection as defined in Article 3(1) of the Convention; (ii) the geographical distribution of workplaces liable to inspection or, at the least, those for which the Government considers that the conditions of work require specific protection from the labour inspection services; (iii) the frequency, content and number of participants at the training courses provided for labour inspectors during their career; (iv) the level of remuneration and conditions for career advancement in relation to other public officials with comparable responsibilities; (v) the proportion of the national budget allocated to the public labour inspection services; (vi) a description of the cases in which inspectors visit enterprises, the procedure followed and the transport facilities that they use for this purpose, the activities that they carry out and their outcome; and (vii) the proportion of supervisory activities carried out by inspectors in relation to their conciliation duties.

The Committee also requests the Government to communicate a copy of any inspection activity reports originating from regional directorates, including the reports cited in the Government’s reports sent to the ILO in 2008 and 2011; a copy of the draft or final text of the regulations relating to the status and conditions of service of labour inspectors; copies of the proposed amendments to the Labour Code, and of the memorandum which was reportedly sent to the ILO and is intended to improve the functioning of the labour inspection service.

In order to establish a labour inspection system that will respond to the social and economic goals which are the object of the Convention, the Committee urges the Government to make every effort to adopt the measures needed to implement the measures described in the Committee’s general observations made in 2007 (concerning the need for effective cooperation between the labour inspection service and the judicial system), in 2009 (concerning the need for statistics on industrial and commercial workplaces subject to labour inspection and the number of workers covered), and 2010 (concerning publication of the content of an annual report on the functioning of the labour inspection system). The Committee recalls once again the possibility of obtaining technical assistance from the ILO and of requesting, within the context of international financial cooperation, financial assistance in order to give the necessary impetus to the establishment and operation of the labour inspection system, and would be grateful for any information on progress made and difficulties encountered.

The Committee expects that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Croatia

Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) (ratification: 1991)

In order to provide a comprehensive view of the issues relating to the application of the ratified Conventions on labour inspection, the Committee considers it appropriate to examine Conventions Nos 81 (labour inspection) and 129 (labour inspection in agriculture) together.

The Committee notes the observations of the Union of Autonomous Trade Unions of Croatia (UATUC) and the Independent Trade Unions of Croatia (NHS) on Convention No. 81, received in 2016.

Article 3(2) of Convention No. 81 and Article 6(3) of Convention No. 129. Additional functions entrusted to labour inspectors. The Committee notes that the Government has not replied to its previous request regarding the role of the labor inspectorate and the justice system in the enforcement of the Foreigners Act (FA) and on joint activities involving the labor inspectorate in combating undeclared work. The Committee notes that pursuant to section 3(2) of the Labour Inspection Act (LIA), labor inspectors conduct inspections in connection with the implementation of other legislation whenever stipulated in specific legislation. The Committee also notes that the Annual Report of the labor inspectorate of 2017, referred to by the Government, contains information on the work of labor inspectors in the enforcement of the provisions of the FA, including measures relating to the work of foreigners without a permit or a work registration certificate (section 208 of the FA). The Committee recalls once again its previous comments that the Convention does not contain any provision suggesting that any workers be excluded from the protection afforded by labor inspection on account of their irregular employment status, and that the primary duty of labor inspectors is to secure the enforcement of the legal provisions relating to conditions of work and the protection of workers and not to enforce immigration law. It further recalls that pursuant to Article 3(2) of Convention No. 81 and Article 6(3) of Convention No. 129, any further duties which may be entrusted to labor inspectors shall not be such as to interfere with the effective discharge of their primary duties. The Committee requests the Government to take measures to ensure that the functions assigned to labor inspectors do not interfere with the main objective of labor inspectors to ensure the protection of workers in accordance with labor inspectors’ primary duties as provided for in Article 3(2) of Convention No. 81 and Article 6(3) of Convention No. 129. It also once again requests the Government to provide detailed information regarding the role of labor inspectors in the enforcement of the FA, as well as any other joint activities between the labor inspectorate and other state bodies aimed at combating undeclared work, including the scope of these activities, the proportion of labor inspection activities and resources directed to the enforcement of the FA or otherwise combating undeclared work, and the impact of these activities on the work of the labor inspectorate with regard to the enforcement of legal provisions on conditions of work and the protection of workers.

Articles 3(2), 10, and 16 of Convention No. 81 and Articles 6(3), 14 and 21 of Convention No. 129. Number of labor inspectors for the effective discharge of the duties of the inspectorate and additional duties. The Committee notes the observations by the UATUC and the NHS that there is an insufficient number of labor inspectors, and that the existing inspection staff is burdened by the quantity of work related to workers’ claims in cases of employer bankruptcy, which prevents them from discharging their primary tasks in the fields of employment relations and occupational health and safety (OSH). The UATUC and NHS further note the likely imminent retirement of many labor inspectors, and that the lack of inspectors has a significant influence on the regularity and quality of inspections in the field of OSH and labor relations. The Committee notes the Government’s statement that, as of 31 December 2016, the labor inspectorate employed a total of 226 labor inspectors and 10 other civil servants in positions related to IT and analytical activities for the improvement of the work carried out by the labor inspectorate and that by 31 December 2017, the number of labor inspectors had increased to 229. Nonetheless, the Government also identifies the insufficient number of labor inspectors as one of the difficulties encountered in the application of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to provide further information regarding the measures taken or envisaged to ensure that a sufficient number of labor inspectors is appointed, in accordance with Article 10 of Convention No. 81 and Article 14 of Convention No. 129, and that existing labor inspectors’ additional duties do not interfere with the effective discharge of their primary duties.

Articles 5(a), 17 and 18 of Convention No. 81 and Articles 12, 22(1) and 24 of Convention No. 129. Institution of legal proceedings and enforcement of adequate penalties. In its previous comments, the Committee noted a decrease in the rate of cases in which the legal proceedings initiated by labor inspectors were declared inadmissible by the misdemeanor courts due to the expiration of the statute of limitations (from 58 to 36.5 per cent), due primarily to the adoption of the Misdemeanours Act modifying the applicable time limits. The Committee notes an absence of information in response to its previous request regarding additional measures to give effect to Articles 5(a), 17 and 18 of Convention No. 81. Recalling the importance of cooperation between the labor inspection system and the justice system, the Committee requests the Government to provide information regarding any measures taken or envisaged to accelerate the examination of cases referred by labor inspectors to the courts and to ensure effective enforcement of adequate and sufficiently dissuasive penalties, including detailed information on the progress achieved or the difficulties encountered as well as statistical information on the number of legal proceedings initiated by labor inspectors that were declared inadmissible, and the main reasons for their inadmissibility.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Dominica

Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) (ratification: 1983)

The Committee notes with concern that the Government’s report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments initially made in 2013.

Articles 3, 6, 7, 10 and 16 of the Convention. Numbers, conditions of service and functions of labor inspection staff. Number of labor inspection visits. The Committee notes from the Government’s report that the Labour Department cannot increase its staff and that inspectors operate in all areas of labour administration. The Government also declares that every attempt is made to ensure that inspectors are professional in their conduct. The Committee requests once again the Government to indicate the criteria and process for the recruitment of labor inspectors, and to specify the training activities provided to them upon their entry into service and in the course of employment. Please also indicate how it is ensured that the conditions of remuneration and career development of labour inspectors reflect the importance and specificities of their duties, and take into account personal merit.

The Committee asks the Government to provide information on the time and resources spent on mediation/conciliation of industrial disputes in relation to their primary duties of inspection established under this Convention. It asks the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that, in accordance with Article 3(2), any duties which may be entrusted to labour inspectors in addition to their primary functions shall not be such as to interfere with the effective discharge of the latter. It also asks the Government to provide information on the measures taken to ensure that all workplaces are inspected as often and as thoroughly as necessary in line with Article 16 of the Convention.

Article 15. Duty of confidentiality. Referring to the Committee’s previous comments on this issue, the Committee notes that the issue is to be addressed by the Industrial Relations Advisory Committee. The Government also reports that the department and labour inspectorate have always maintained strict confidentiality. The Committee once again requests the Government to take steps to ensure that the legislation is supplemented so as to give full effect to Article 15 of the Convention and to keep the Office informed of all progress in this respect and to send copies of any relevant draft or final texts.

Articles 3(a), 17, 18, 20 and 21. Cooperation with the justice system and enforcement of adequate penalties. Publication and content of an annual report. The Committee notes from the Government’s report that steps will be taken to improve the quality of the annual report on inspection services. The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to ensure that an annual report on the work of the labour inspection services is elaborated and published and that it contains information on all the items listed in Article 21 of the Convention, notably, statistics of inspection visits, violations and penalties imposed as well as industrial accidents and cases of occupational disease. The Committee draws the Government’s attention in this regard to the guidance provided in Paragraph 9 of the Labour Inspection Recommendation, 1947 (No. 81) as to the type of information that should be included in the annual labour inspection reports.

The Committee expects that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Ghana

Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) (ratification: 1959)

Articles 10, 11 and 16 of the Convention. Human resources and material means of the labour inspectorate and coverage of workplaces. The Committee previously noted the Government’s reference to a shortage of human resources and material means, including vehicles, as well as to its commitment to addressing these issues.

The Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report that there are 171 inspection staff. It once again indicates that it plans to hire more staff to strengthen the labour inspection system, which will enable the Labour Department to conduct more inspections and improve the coverage of the establishments. The Committee also notes that, according to the Statistical Reports of the Ministry of Employment and Labour Relations for the years 2014, 2015 and 2016, published on the Ministry’s website, the number of labour inspections undertaken by the Labour Department were 243 in 2014, 357 in 2015 and 305 in 2016. The number of inspections undertaken by the Department of Factories Inspectorate on occupational safety and health in registered workplaces declined from 2,405 in 2014, to 1,974 in 2015 and 1,715 in 2016, with decreases in almost every sector. The Committee notes that according to the Statistical Report of 2016, there were 57,925 registered establishments in 2016. The Government states that challenges include an insufficient number of inspectors and vehicles to conduct efficient inspections of workplaces. It further notes the statement in Ghana’s National Employment Policy, published in 2015, that despite efforts to revamp the labour administration system, challenges persist, including ineffective labour inspection, inadequate staff for labour administration institutions and inadequate logistics for inspection and enforcement.

The Committee expects that the Government will make every effort to ensure that the labour inspection services have at their disposal an adequate number of labour inspectors and the required material resources to enable them to effectively carry out their duties, including by ensuring the allocation of the financial resources necessary. It requests the Government to continue to provide information on the number of inspections undertaken by the Labour Department and the Department of Factories Inspectorate, as well as the number of inspectors in each Department. Lastly, the Committee requests the Government to provide information concerning the reasons for the decline in the number of inspections undertaken by the Department of Factories Inspectorate between 2014 and 2016, and the measures taken to ensure that workplaces are inspected as often and as thoroughly as is necessary to ensure the effective application of the legal provisions.

Articles 17, 18 and 21(e). Enforcement of the legal provisions relating to the conditions of work and the protection of workers. The Committee previously requested information on the application of penalties, as well as concerning the revision of penalties for labour law provisions. The Committee notes in this regard that the Government once again refers to its commitment to dialogue, persuasion and diplomacy, but also states that the legal provisions in the Labour Act are fully applied so as to sanction any employer who violates its provisions. The Committee also observes that the penalties in the Labour Act are defined in terms of “penalty units” that are defined pursuant to the Fines (Penalty Units) Act of 2000. The Committee notes from the Government’s report that there has not been any change in legislation to give effect to this Article of the Convention and that the issue is to be addressed by the Industrial Relations Advisory Committee. The Government also reports that the labour inspectorate and the Department of Factories Inspectorate have always maintained strict confidentiality. The Committee once again requests the Government to take steps to ensure that the legislation is supplemented so as to give full effect to Article 15 of the Convention and to keep the Office informed of all progress in this respect and to send copies of any relevant draft or final texts.

The Committee expects that the Government will make every effort to implement the legal provisions. The Committee notes from the Government’s report that there has not been any change in legislation to give effect to Article 15 of the Convention and that the issue is to be addressed by the Industrial Relations Advisory Committee. The Government also reports that the labour inspectorate and the Department of Factories Inspectorate have always maintained strict confidentiality. The Committee once again requests the Government to take steps to ensure that the legislation is supplemented so as to give full effect to Article 15 of the Convention and to keep the Office informed of all progress in this respect and to send copies of any relevant draft or final texts.

The Committee expects that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

The Committee notes with regret that the Government’s report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments initially made in 2016.

Articles 20 and 21 of the Convention. Establishment, publication and communication to the ILO of annual inspection reports. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that despite its reiterated comments on this subject, no annual labour inspection reports had been communicated to the ILO since 1995. It notes that the Government underlines the importance of establishing, publishing and transmitting annual labour inspection reports, but that it indicates that the annual reports as currently prepared do not contain all of the subjects as required under Article 21. The Committee urges the Government to indicate the measures adopted or envisaged to ensure that annual inspection reports are published and transmitted to the ILO in accordance with the requirements of Articles 20 and 21. The Committee reminds the Government, once again, that it may avail itself of technical assistance for this purpose.

The Committee requests the Government in any event to provide statistical information that is as detailed as possible on the activities of the labour inspection services (industrial and commercial workplaces liable to inspection, number of inspections, infringements detected and the legal provisions to which they relate, penalties applied, number of industrial accidents and cases of occupational disease, etc.) to enable the Committee to make an informed assessment on the application of the Convention in practice.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government. The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Guinea-Bissau

Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) (ratification: 1977)

The Committee notes with deep concern that the Government’s report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments initially made in 2013.

Articles 3(1), 7(3), 10, 11, 14 and 16 of the Convention. Functioning of the labour inspection system. The Committee notes that the application of the Convention faces significant and persistent challenges of a financial and material nature. It notes, for instance, that there are too few inspectors and that the General Labour and Social Security Inspectorate has inadequate means of transport. The Committee is also led to believe that the Government is not in a position to provide labour inspectors with adequate training for the performance of their duties, in accordance with Article 7(3) of the Convention. It notes, however, that the inspectors benefited from a number of training activities under the subregion’s technical cooperation framework pertaining to labour inspection structures and under the Community of Portuguese-speaking countries (CPLP). The Government also refers to difficulties inherent in gathering reliable data on industrial accidents and cases of occupational diseases, which may be attributed to the under-reporting of workers themselves. The Government is also trying to create conditions that will enable it to send on a regular basis the information available on each of the questions listed under Article 21 and in the format stipulated under Article 20, but it is encountering difficulties of various kinds and would therefore require the ILO’s technical assistance for this purpose.

The Committee asks the Government to submit a formal request to the ILO for technical assistance with a view to drafting and publishing an annual inspection report, as provided for under Articles 20 and 21 of the Convention, and to envisage extending this request to the collection and recording of statistical information on industrial accidents and cases of occupational diseases, and to the establishment of a system to assess the labour inspection services, with a view to determining the measures to be introduced to improve its efficiency. The Committee requests the Government to submit in its next report information on any developments in this area.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government. The Committee expects that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Haiti

Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) (ratification: 1952)

The Committee notes the observations of the Confederation of Public and Private Sector Workers (CTSP), received on 30 August 2017 and 29 August 2018. The Committee notes with deep concern that the Government’s report has not been received. While it is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments initially made in 2012, the Committee notes the Government’s communication received on 30 October 2018 in which it informs the Committee that, further to the conclusions of the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards, it has requested ILO technical assistance with a view to helping in the presentation of the reports due, strengthening the inspection services, consolidating social dialogue for the continuation of social reforms, and addressing the other points raised by the Conference Committee. The Government adds that it hopes to receive the requested assistance before the next session of the International Labour Conference. The Committee hopes that this technical assistance will be provided without delay and that it will give rise to timely delivery of all outstanding reports. It also requests the Government to send its comments on the observations of the CTSP of 2016, 2017 and 2018.

The Committee notes the observations of the Confederation of Public and Private Sector Workers (CTSP), received on 31 August 2016.

The Committee notes that, according to the CTSP, although the Government receives ILO assistance to strengthen the labour inspectorate, the Government shows a lack of will to make the labour inspectorate operational. The CTSP reiterates its previous observations concerning: (i) the lack of inspections in sectors other than the textile industry, such as the hotel industry, the restaurant industry, petrol stations and construction; the precarious material resources made available to labour inspectors, particularly the transport facilities necessary for the performance of their duties; (iii) the recruitment of labour inspectors on the basis of “cronyism”; (iv) the inadequate academic level of labour inspectors; and (v) their low remuneration, which is often paid late, making labour inspectors vulnerable to corruption. The CTSP adds that no steps have been taken to set up a database containing labour statistics as a basis for the development of policies and actions. The trade union further indicates that inspectors are at risk of being transferred, dismissed and penalized if they take decisions that run counter to the interests of certain employers. The Committee requests the Government to send its comments on this matter.

Articles 3, 12, 13, 15, 16, 17 and 18 of the Convention. Discharge of primary duties of the labour inspectorate. Further to the Committee’s previous comments, the ITUC [International Trade Union Confederation] stresses the need to reform the Labour Code, especially section 411, which stipulates that labour inspectors shall provide employers and workers with technical information and advice “where necessary”.

The Committee notes the Government’s proposal to modify the expression “where necessary” in section 411 as part of the revision of the Labour Code, which is due to take place with technical support from the ILO, with a view to harmonizing the Labour Code with the international labour Conventions ratified by Haiti. The Government also emphasizes that, despite the wording of section 411 of the Labour Code, inspections have been conducted regularly over the last three years in Port-au-Prince and certain departments of the country.

The Committee recalls that the role of the labour inspectorate must not be limited to reacting to requests from workers or employers, and that inspections of workplaces, whether scheduled or not, should be conducted as often and as thoroughly as necessary throughout the country (Article 16), in order to enable the labour inspectorate to discharge its primary duties, as provided for in Article 3(1). The Committee notes that the effectiveness of the inspection system and the credibility of inspectors for employers and workers depends largely on the manner in which inspectors exercise their prerogatives (right to enter workplaces, direct or indirect powers of injunction, reporting infringements, initiating proceedings, etc.) and meet their obligations (such as displaying probity and observing confidentiality), as established by Articles 3, 12, 13, 15, 17 and 18 of the Convention.

The Committee requests the Government to keep the Office informed of any progress made regarding the revision of section 411 of the Labour Code, so that the provision of technical information and advice to employers and workers is recognized as a permanent function of the labour inspectorate in conformity with Article 3(1)(b).

The Committee also requests the Government to supply detailed information together with statistics on the planning and implementation of systematic inspections throughout the country, including in the export processing zones, and also their results (identification of infringements or irregularities, technical advice and information, observations, injunctions, notices of infringement, legal proceedings initiated or recommended, penalties imposed and enforced), and to indicate any obstacles to the full application in practice of the prerogatives and obligations of labour inspectors.

Finally, the Committee requests the Government to send a copy of the report form on violations and of some of such reports which have already been completed.

Articles 6, 8, 10 and 11. Human and material resources available to the labour inspectorate. The Government refers to the obstacles encountered in the application in practice of the Convention which, according to its report, are numerous: inadequate numbers of labour inspectors in view of the number, nature and size of workplaces liable to inspection and the complexity of the provisions of the Labour Code in force; lack of logistical resources; insufficient budget resources for paying reasonable salaries to labour inspectors; lack of mobile resources to facilitate the transportation of inspectors and enable them to fully perform their duties; premises inaccessible to certain persons (especially persons with disabilities).

According to the ITUC, the labour inspection services continue to lack the resources to be fully operational and show deficiencies in terms of supervision on the ground.

The Committee requests the Government to supply detailed information on the measures taken or envisaged, including having recourse to international financial aid, to obtain the necessary funds to build the capacities of the labour inspection system, especially by increasing the number of labour inspectors and the material and logistical resources available to the labour inspectorate.

The Committee also refers to paragraph 209 of its 2006 General Survey on labour inspection. While being fully aware of the problems faced by the Government, it is bound to emphasize the importance that it places on the treatment of labour inspectors in a way that reflects the importance and specific features of their duties and takes account of personal merit. The Committee requests the Government to indicate all the measures taken or envisaged to improve the status and conditions of service of inspectors, so that they correspond to the conditions of public officials performing comparable tasks, such as tax inspectors.

Articles 5(a) and 21(e). Effective cooperation with other government departments and with employers’ and workers’ organizations. The Committee requests the Government to provide details of this cooperation and its impact on the effectiveness of the action of the labour inspectorate, with a view to the application of the legal provisions relating to conditions of work and the protection of workers while engaged in their work.

The Committee requests the Government to provide statistics on the follow-up to reports of infringements submitted by the labour inspectorate to the judicial bodies and to state whether measures have been taken or envisaged to strengthen cooperation between the labour inspectorate and the justice system, for example by the creation of a system for the registration of judicial decisions accessible to the labour inspectorate, to enable the central authority to use this information to achieve its objectives, and to include them in the annual report, in accordance with Article 21(e) of the Convention.

The Committee also requests the Government to indicate the measures taken or envisaged to strengthen collaboration between the labour inspectorate and employers’ and workers’ organizations (Article 5(b)), including in the construction sector, which, in the opinion of the Government constitutes a priority for the revival of the country. The Committee recalls the guidance given in Paragraphs 4-7 of the Labour Inspection Recommendation, 1947 (No. 81), regarding collaboration between employers and workers in relation to safety and health.

Article 7(3). Training of inspectors. Further to the Committee’s comments on this subject, the ITUC notes certain gaps in the area of training, whereas the Government refers to a number of training courses in 2008 and 2011 with the support of the ILO and international donors. The Committee requests the Government to indicate the measures taken or envisaged to develop a training strategy, and to provide information on the frequency, content and duration of training given to labour inspectors, and also on the number of participants and the impact of this training on the effective performance of labour inspection duties.

Article 14. Notification and registration of industrial accidents and cases of occupational disease. The Committee notes the comments of the ITUC on the need to provide data on this subject and the information provided by the Government according to which industrial accidents are notified to the general inspectorate of OFATMA. The Committee requests the Government to describe in detail the system for the notification of industrial accidents and cases of occupational disease and to indicate the measures taken or envisaged following the earthquake, in order to collect and supply statistics on this subject, including in the construction sector.

The Committee urges the Government, as a preliminary stage in the preparation of an annual inspection report and in order to evaluate the situation of the labour inspection services in terms of their needs, to compile an inventory and register of industrial and commercial workplaces liable to inspection (number, activity, size and geographical situation) and of the workers employed in them (number and categories), and to keep the Office informed of any progress made in this field. The Committee expects that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

In order to provide a comprehensive view of the issues relating to the application of ratified Conventions on labour inspection, the Committee considers it appropriate to examine Conventions Nos 81 (labour inspection) and 129 (labour inspection in agriculture) together.

Article 3(1) and (2) of Convention No. 81 and Article 6(1) and (3) of Convention No. 129. Additional functions entrusted to labour inspectors. The Committee previously noted that combating illegal employment was a priority for labour inspection, and that the labour inspection services were regularly associated in joint inspections to eradicate illegal migration, among others, in cooperation with the police and the custom authorities. In this respect, the Committee notes the Government’s reference to the Labour Inspection Act, which entrusts labour inspectors, among other things, with the control of the work and residence permits of foreign workers, and the notification to the immigration police of any decision concerning the infringement of the provisions on the employment of foreign workers (sections 3(1)(i) and 7/A(7) of the Labour Inspection Act).

The Committee once again notes that the Government has not provided the information requested on the role of labour inspectors in granting foreign workers in an irregular situation their due rights resulting from their employment relationship. The Committee recalls that, pursuant to Article 3(1) and (2) of Convention No. 81 and Article 6 of Convention No. 129, the functions of the system of labour inspection shall be to secure the enforcement of the legal provisions relating to conditions of work and the protection of workers while engaged in their work, and any further duties which may be entrusted to labour inspectors shall not be such as to interfere with the effective discharge of their primary duties. In this respect it stated in its 2006 General Survey, Labour inspection, paragraph 78, that any function of verifying the legality of employment should have as its corollary the reinstatement of the statutory rights of all the workers if it is to be compatible with the objective of labour inspection, which is to protect the rights and interests of all workers and to improve their working conditions. In this respect, the Committee also recalls that in its 2017 General Survey on certain occupational safety and health instruments, it indicated that workers in a vulnerable situation may not be willing to cooperate with the labour inspection services if they fear negative consequences as a result of inspection activities, such as the loss of their job or expulsion from the country (paragraph 452) or that their complaint will not be kept confidential.

The Committee requests the Government to take measures to ensure that the functions assigned to labour inspectors do not interfere with the main objective of labour inspectors to secure the protection of workers in accordance with labour inspectors’ primary duties as provided for in Article 3(2) of Convention No. 81 and Article 6(3) of Convention No. 129. It also once again requests the Government to indicate the manner in which the labour inspectorate discharges its primary duties in ensuring the enforcement of employers’ obligations with regard to any statutory rights workers may have in an irregular situation for the period of their effective employment relationship. It urges the Government to provide information on the number of cases in which workers found to be in an irregular situation have been granted their due rights, such as the payment of outstanding wages or social security benefits. In addition, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the manner in which it ensures that labour inspectors treat as absolutely confidential the source of any complaint bringing to their notice a defect or breach of legal provisions.

Articles 10 and 16 of Convention No. 81 and Articles 15 and 21 of Convention No. 129. Number of labour inspectors and effectiveness of the labour inspection system. The Committee previously noted a significant decrease in the number of labour inspectors from 696 to 401 between 2008 and 2013. In this respect, the Committee noted that the comments of the workers’ representatives of the Tripartite National ILO Council (included in the Government’s reports) had indicated that this decrease had compromised the efficiency of inspections as shown by the increase in the number of industrial accidents and violations detected in recent years. On the other hand, the Committee noted the Government’s reply to these comments indicating that the increased number of violations detected was in fact a result of the enhanced efficiency of inspections due to the establishment of labour inspection priorities which were determined by annual labour inspection plans (focused on high risk sectors).

The Committee notes with concern from the statistics provided in the Government’s report that the number of labour inspectors continued to decrease to 393 labour inspectors (as of May 2017), and that the number of occupational accidents increased between 2010 and 2016 from 19,948 per year to 23,027. The Committee recalls from its 2017 General Survey on certain occupational safety and health instruments, paragraph 441, that focusing inspections on the most hazardous workplaces must not diminish the overall resource commitment of the labour inspectorate. Noting the significant decline in the number of inspectors since 2008, as well as the increase in the number of occupational accidents reported, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the number of labour inspections are adequate to ensure the effective protection of workers. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide statistical information on the number of labour inspectors, inspection visits, violations detected and penalties imposed. It also requests the Government to continue to provide information on the number of occupational accidents, and to provide an explanation for their increased number in recent years.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

India

Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) (ratification: 1949)

The Committee notes the observations made by the Centre of Indian Trade Unions (CITU) received on 14 March 2018.

Articles 2, 4 and 23 of the Convention. Labour inspection in special economic zones (SEZs). In its previous comments, the Committee noted the Government’s indication that very few inspections had been carried out in SEZs. It also noted that the Development Commissioners, who are responsible for attracting investment, continued to exercise inspection powers in some SEZs. In this respect, the Committee notes the observations made by the CITU to the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards (CAS) in 2017 and again by the CITU in its observations made in March 2018 that there is virtually no inspection system in SEZs. The trade union adds that despite the absence of violations reported, there are violations of all basic labour laws in SEZs and that there has been no improvement in the situation since the discussion in the CAS in June 2017.

The Committee notes the explanations provided by the Government, in its report in response to the Committee’s request on the authorities responsible for inspections, that there are currently seven SEZ zones. The Government states that in some cases, the SEZs cover several states and that the situation with regard to inspections may differ within one SEZ, depending on the state where the enterprise is physically located. The Government adds that inspection powers are assumed by Development Commissioners in two SEZs, namely Visakhapatnam and Mumbai Seepz (except with regard to the supervision of the Factories Act including its occupational safety and health provisions). In five SEZs (Noida, Cochin, Madras, Falta and Kandla) inspection powers have not been delegated to the Development Commissioners (except in one of the ten states in which operations of the SEZ Noida take place). The Committee notes the Government’s indication that no powers were delegated in relation to laws that are administered centrally. The Committee also notes the information provided by the Government for five of the seven SEZs (except for Cochin and Falda), including information on the number of enterprises and workers. While the Committee notes that these statistics are more detailed than those provided by the Government in recent years, they still do not enable the Committee to make an informed assessment of the protection of workers in these zones. Moreover, the Committee notes that no information is available (or no penalties were imposed) in most of the SEZs for which statistics were provided (in Kandla two criminal prosecutions and prison terms were reported). The Committee once again requests the Government, in line with the 2017 conclusions of the CAS, to ensure that effective labour inspections are conducted in all of the existing SEZs. In this respect, it once again requests the Government to provide detailed statistical information on labour inspections in all SEZs, including on the number of enterprises and workers in each SEZ, the number of routine and unannounced visits, the number and nature of offences reported, the number of penalties imposed, the amounts of fines imposed and collected, and information on criminal prosecutions, if any.

Articles 10 and 11. Material means and human resources at the central and state levels. The Committee recalls the 2017 conclusions of the CAS concerning the need to increase the resources at the disposal of the central and state government inspectorates. The Committee notes the statistics provided by the Government in its report on the number of labour inspectors at the central and state levels, which for the state level is the same information that was provided by the Government in 2017 to the CAS and does not reflect any additional recruitments. Concerning the status of labour inspectors, the Committee notes the Government’s clarification, in reply to the Committee’s request, that the possibility to employ staff on a temporary basis as labour inspectors only concerns the deployment of public servants from other Government services. The Committee once again requests the Government to increase the resources at the disposal of the central and state government inspectorates, and to continue to provide information on the number of labour inspectors at the central level and in all states. Because the Government has only provided general information in this respect, the Committee also once again requests the Government to provide more detailed information on the available material resources and transport facilities (such as number of vehicles) of the labour inspection services at the central and state levels.

Articles 12 and 17. Free initiative of labour inspectors to enter workplaces without prior notice, and discretion to initiate legal proceedings without previous warning. Code on the Wages Bill, the Occupational Safety and Health and Working Conditions Bill, and ongoing legislative reform. The Committee previously noted that the Code on Wages, 2017 Bill does not explicitly refer to the principles contained in Article 12(1)(a) and (b), but provides that the governments at the state levels may lay down separate inspection schemes (including the generation of a web-based inspection schedule). It also previously noted that the Code on Wages Bill renames labour inspectors as “facilitators” and requires inspectors to give previous warning and provide additional time to rectify a violation before any penal procedures may be initiated. The Committee notes the Government’s indication, in response to the Committee’s request, that several tripartite meetings were held in the drafting process of the Code on Wages Bill. The Government further emphasizes that the Code on Wages Bill does not curtail inspection powers where inspections are necessary, and that in the event of complaints made or indicators of the existence of labour law violations, labour inspectors will continue to have full discretion to undertake inspections without prior notice and initiate the required actions. The Government indicates that the Code on Wages Bill is currently before the Parliamentary Standing Committee.

The Committee further notes that the OSH and Working Conditions Bill, published on the website of the Ministry of Labour and Employment in March 2018, also renames labour inspectors as “facilitators” (section 34(1)), and provides that they conduct inspections, including web-based inspections (as prescribed by the governments at the state levels (section 34(2)). The Committee also notes that facilitators have the power to prosecute, conduct or defend before a court any complaint or other proceeding arising under the OSH and Working Conditions Code, or the rules and regulations made thereunder (section 35(xii)), and to exercise such powers as may be prescribed (section 35(xiii)). However, the Bill is silent with regard to the powers of labour inspectors to initiate legal proceedings against persons who violate or neglect to observe legal provisions enforceable by labour inspectors. Moreover, the OSH and Working Conditions Bill requires inspectors to give prior notice of at least three days before conducting inspections in mines, except in dangerous situations (section 39).

With reference to its 2006 General Survey, Labour inspection, paragraph 263, the Committee recalls that unannounced visits enable the inspector to enter the inspected premises without warning the employer or his or her representative in advance, especially in cases where the employer may be expected to attempt to conceal a violation, by changing the usual conditions of work, preventing a witness from being present or making it impossible to carry out an inspection. The Committee also recalls that under Article 17, persons who violate or neglect to observe legal provisions enforceable by labour inspectors shall be liable to prompt legal or administrative proceedings without previous warning, and that the possibility of giving previous notice to carry out remedial or preventive measures may be provided for in national laws or regulations by way of exception. Recalling that the CAS requested the Government to take measures to ensure that any legislation developed was in conformity with the Convention, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the Code on Wages and the OSH and Working Conditions Act explicitly allow labour inspectors on their own initiative to enter workplaces without prior notice, not limited to situations where complaints have been made or indicators exist for labour law violations, in conformity with Article 12(1)(a) and (b) of the Convention. It also requests the Government to ensure that the Code on Wages and the OSH and Working Conditions Act will guarantee the discretion of labour inspectors to initiate prompt legal or administrative proceedings without previous warning, or to order remedial measures and give warnings instead of instituting or recommending proceedings, where the situation so requires (Article 17 of the Convention).

Effect given to the above-mentioned principles in practice. Statistics on labour inspections without previous notice, and the initiation of legal proceedings without previous warning. The Committee notes the information provided by the Government, in response to its request, on the number of violations detected and the relevant prosecutions initiated at the central level and 36 state/union territories. However, the Committee also notes that the Government has not provided the requested information on those cases where a prior warning had been issued before the initiation of legal proceedings and where immediate enforcement action has been taken. The Committee therefore once again requests the Government, to provide information not only on the total number of violations detected and the number of legal proceedings initiated by labour inspectors, but to disaggregate this information between those cases where a prior warning had been issued beforehand and where immediate enforcement action had been implemented. The Committee also requests the Government to provide information on the total number of inspections undertaken, distinguishing those inspections that were undertaken with and without prior notice.

Articles 4, 20 and 21. Availability of statistical information on the activities of the labour inspection services at the central and state levels. Availability of statistics in specific sectors. The Committee notes that, once again, no annual report on the work of the labour inspection services has been communicated to the Office, although it notes that the Government refers to the reports published by the Labour Bureau (a Department of the Ministry of Labour and Employment) in 2013 and 2014. The Committee takes due note of the information provided by the Government concerning the number of inspections undertaken, violations detected and prosecutions initiated. It notes that there are still no statistics on the application of the labour legislation in the information technology (IT) and IT-enabled services (ITES) sectors. The Committee recalls from the information submitted by the Government to the CAS in 2017 that, in view of the federal structure of the country and the sovereignty of the states, there is no statutory mechanism for the states to furnish data to the central Government, and that relevant information is provided by the states on a voluntary basis.

The Committee notes the reiterated indications made by the Government concerning a project for the strengthening and modernization of the collection of statistics by the Labour Bureau. This project is planned to include an online-reporting system to enable the improved collection and compilation of statistics, including data from the states. The Committee also notes the Government’s indication, in response to the Committee’s request, that enterprises are required to maintain registers and provide information about their activities, and that there are efforts to unify reporting forms and registers. However, the Committee notes that the Government does not provide the requested information on the maintenance of workplace registers at the central and state levels. The Committee once again urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the central authority, at the central level or the state levels, publishes and submits to the ILO annual reports on labour inspection activities containing all the information required by Article 21. The Committee encourages the Government to pursue its efforts towards the establishment of registers of workplaces at the central and state levels and the computerization and modernization of the data collection system, and to provide detailed information on any progress made in this respect. In this regard, the Committee also once again requests the Government to provide detailed information on the progress made with respect to measures taken to improve the data collection system enabling the registration of data in all sectors.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

[The Government is asked to reply in full to the present comments in 2019.]

Indonesia

Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) (ratification: 2004)

Articles 1, 4, 10 and 11 of the Convention. Impact of decentralization and the effective functioning of the labour inspection system. Number of labour inspectors and material means placed at their disposal. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that one of the results of the decentralization of the labour inspection system was the unequal allocation of financial resources among local labour inspection services. The Committee notes the Government’s indication in its report that, based on necessity and the lack of manpower, local civil servants may follow basic training on labour inspection to be deployed in the relevant area. The Committee also notes that, according to information provided by the ILO Country Office in Jakarta, 108 labour inspectors were appointed from existing civil servants in 2018. The Government also indicates that the Ministry of Manpower provides assistance to provincial government officials, which includes the testing of equipment for occupational safety and health (OSH) purposes. The Committee notes that while the Government’s report, submitted in 2017, places the number of labour inspectors at 1,987, the Directorate-General of Labour Inspection and OSH Development, in its report entitled “Strategy for Strengthening Labour Inspection in Indonesia”, indicates that the number of labour inspectors has declined over the past four years from 1,927 in 2016 to 1,574 in 2018, and that the budget allocation for labour inspection has decreased from year to year. That report further identified the need for additional facilities and infrastructure for labour inspectors, including adding new means of transportation and offices with adequate equipment. Recalling that labour inspectors must be appointed in sufficient numbers to secure the effective discharge of their duties, the Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that labour inspectors are appointed in sufficient numbers at all levels (national, provincial and district/city), in accordance with Article 10 of the Convention. It requests the Government to continue to provide information on the total number and geographical distribution of appointed labour inspectors (disaggregated by gender), including identifying the number of inspectors recruited from existing civil servants, and the allocation of resources to labour inspection offices by the provincial and city/district levels of government. The Committee also requests the Government to take measures to improve the material conditions of work of labour inspectors in terms of offices, equipment and transport facilities, in accordance with Article 11 of the Convention, and to provide further information regarding measures taken or envisaged in this regard.

Article 6. Conditions of service of labour inspectors. The Committee notes the indication in the “Strategy for Strengthening Labour Inspection in Indonesia” report that, in addition to limited training and professional development opportunities, the low levels of remuneration do not encourage a professional inspectorate. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the inspection staff is composed of public officials whose conditions of service are such that they are assured the stability of employment, in accordance with Article 6 of the Convention. It requests the Government to provide further information in this regard.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Kyrgyzstan

Articles 12, 16, 17 and 18 of the Convention. Limitations and restrictions of labour inspection. Effective enforcement of penalties for labour law provisions. The Committee notes that labour inspections, just as a number of other public inspections, are governed by the Law No. 72 of 2007 (as amended) on the conduct of inspections in enterprises. The Committee notes with concern that the Law provides for various limitations on labour inspection powers and the undertaking of labour inspections, including restrictions relating to: (i) the power to undertake labour inspections without prior notice (scheduled inspection visits have to be notified at least ten days prior to the inspection (section 6(6)); (ii) the free initiative of labour inspectors (labour inspections require a formal authorization, in coordination with the body for the development of entrepreneurship (section 12(3)); (iii) the frequency of labour inspections (e.g. scheduled inspections shall not be conducted more than once a year in workplaces considered to be at high risk, and not more than once every three years in workplaces with an average degree of risk (section 6(3)), and inspections shall not be conducted in new businesses within the first three years of their operation (section 6(8)); and (iv) the scope of inspections, particularly in terms of the issues that can be examined in the course of inspections (see sections 6(5) and 7(4)). The Committee further notes that inspectors risk being released from their office, pursuant to section 20 of Law No. 72 where a court does not confirm the existence of a violation as detected by an inspector, and where the court considers that this is the result of a fault of the labour inspector. The Committee recalls that Article 12 of the Convention provides that labour inspectors shall be empowered to enter workplaces liable to inspection freely and without previous notice and to carry out any examination, test or enquiry which they may consider necessary in order to satisfy themselves that the legal provisions are being strictly observed, and that Article 16 provides for the undertaking of labour inspections as often as is necessary to ensure the effective application of the relevant legal provisions.

Concerning the effective enforcement of penalties for labour law violations, the Committee notes that section 11 of Law No. 72 provides that scheduled and unscheduled inspections are not intended to impose financial or other sanctions on businesses and that in the event of an observed violation of the legislation during a scheduled inspection, inspectors may issue a written warning to the enterprise requesting it to eliminate the violation within 30 days (three days if the violation impacts the safety or health), and following the expiry of this delay, may take measures to influence the enterprise, as provided for in legislation. In this regard, the Committee recalls that Article 17 of the Convention provides that, with certain exceptions, legal provisions enforceable by labour inspectors shall be liable to prompt legal proceedings without previous warning, and that it must be left to the discretion of labour inspectors to give a warning or advice instead of instituting or recommending proceedings. The Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that labour inspectors are empowered to make visits to workplaces liable to inspection without previous notice in conformity with Article 12(1)(a) of the Convention and that they are able to undertake labour inspections as often and as thoroughly as is necessary to ensure the effective application of the legal provisions, in conformity with Article 16 of the Convention. It further urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that labour inspectors are able to initiate or recommend immediate legal proceedings without prior warning, where required, in conformity with Article 17 of the Convention.

Articles 20 and 21. Annual labour inspection report. The Committee notes with regret that the Government has never submitted an annual report on the work of the labour inspection activities, and that the last statistical data on labour inspection activities were provided in the Government’s report in 2004. The Committee once again requests the Government to provide information on the steps taken by the central labour inspection authority with a view to publishing and transmitting to the Office an annual report on the work of the inspection services under its control.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Malawi

Labour Inspection (Agriculture) Convention, 1969 (No. 129)
(ratification: 1971)

The Committee refers to its comments in relation to Articles 4, 6, 7, 10 and 11 of the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81), in so far as they concern the application of the corresponding Articles of the present Convention (Articles 7, 8, 9, 14 and 15). In addition, the Committee wishes to raise the following points.

Articles 26 and 27 of the Convention. Annual report on labour inspection (agriculture). The Committee notes the Government’s statement that it intends to publish an annual report on the work of labour inspection in agriculture as part of its annual general report. The Committee encourages the Government to pursue its efforts to publish an annual labour inspection report on the work of the inspection services in agriculture and to take the necessary measures to ensure that the report contains the elements set out in Article 27, such as agricultural undertakings liable to inspection, number of inspections therein, violations detected and the legal provisions to which they relate.

Application in practice. The Committee notes the statement in Malawi’s Decent Work Country Programme (DWCP) 2011–16 that the agricultural sector is the mainstay of the economy, providing a livelihood to 80 per cent of the population. It also notes that one of the strategies for the DWCP is the improved implementation of the Convention, as well as Convention No. 81. Noting the significant proportion of workers engaged in the agricultural sector, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken, within the framework of the DWCP 2011–16, to improve the implementation of the Convention in practice.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.
Republic of Moldova

Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81)
(ratification: 1996)

Labour Inspection (Agriculture) Convention, 1969 (No. 129)
(ratification: 1997)

In order to provide a comprehensive view of the issues relating to the application of ratified Conventions on labour inspection, the Committee considers it appropriate to examine Conventions Nos 81 (labour inspection) and 129 (labour inspection in agriculture) together.

The Committee notes the observations made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in a communication received 1 September 2018 as well as the observations made by the National Confederation of Trade Unions of Moldova (CNSM) in its communications received on 4 January and 4 September 2018. In its observations of 4 September, the CNSM indicates that the report of the Government had not been submitted to it. The CNSM states that it is regrettable that no effective measures have so far been taken to adapt national legislation to the provisions of Conventions Nos 81 and 129, nor to give due consideration to the recommendations of the report of the tripartite committee set up to examine the representation alleging non observance by the Republic of Moldova of Convention No. 81 submitted under article 24 of the ILO Constitution, adopted by the Governing Body in March 2015 (GB.323/INS/11/6). The Committee requests the Government to provide its comments in response to the observations of the CNSM.

Follow-up to the conclusions of the Committee on the Application of Standards (International Labour Conference, 107th Session, May–June 2018)

The Committee notes that in June 2018, the Committee on the Application of Standards (CAS) recommended that the Government take the necessary measures and appropriate reforms to bring their labour inspection services into line with the provisions of Conventions Nos 81 and 129 in law and practice, including enabling inspectors to carry out visits to workplaces liable to inspection without prior notice in order to guarantee adequate and effective supervision; ensure that inspections are proportionate to the legitimate aim pursued and are possible as often as necessary; and provide to this Committee, in writing, detailed and precise information related to a range of provisions and requirements under the two Conventions.

Article 4 of Convention No. 81 and Article 7 of Convention No. 129. Supervision and control of a central authority. Occupational safety and health. The Committee previously noted that Law No. 131 of 2012 on state control of entrepreneurial activities withdraws supervisory duties in the area of occupational safety and health (OSH) from the State Labour Inspectorate (SLI) and transfers it to ten other agencies. The Government indicated that OSH inspectors would be appointed in the respective agencies reporting both to their respective sectoral agencies as well as to the SLI.

The Committee notes that the CAS, in 2018, recalled that the labour inspectorate shall be placed under the supervision and control of a central authority.

The Committee notes the observations of the ITUC expressing concern about the fragmentation and weakening of the labour inspectorate by the introduction of Law No. 131, including the transfer of competencies in the area of OSH to ten different sectoral agencies. The ITUC states that the limitations introduced in Law No. 131 have weakened labour inspections, in contradiction with Conventions Nos 81 and 129, and have resulted in occupational accidents, including fatal ones. The Committee notes the Government’s statement that the reform aims to ensure that a single enterprise is not inspected for the same type of activity or production process by different control bodies, thereby avoid the duplication of inspections. The Government indicates that the methodology on state control over entrepreneurial activities, based on risk analysis, is in the process of finalization, which will ensure the application of standard rules in the planning and implementation of OSH inspections for the ten sectoral agencies. This methodology will be monitored and coordinated by the SLI. The Government further refers to separate consultations held with the World Bank and the International Finance Corporation on the development of a regulatory framework on OSH. It states that an e-learning training system will be developed in 2019 to provide training to staff in the field of OSH, but that the system still requires financial means. The Government further indicates that until 23 May 2019, responsibility for the investigation of severe and fatal work-related accidents will remain with the SLI (by virtue of Law No. 79/2018). In addition, the Government indicates that most, but not all, of the sectoral agencies have territorial offices, and that inspectors with OSH responsibilities within the agencies will be provided with the status of civil servants. Further, the Government states that the ten sectoral agencies have been provided with forms for monthly reporting and that the Ministry of Health, Labour and Social Protection has requested that the agencies submit information on a weekly basis on the OSH activities carried out. The Committee observes, in this respect, that the annual labour inspection report of 2017, submitted by the Government, appears to only reflect the activities of the SLI and not the OSH activities of the sectoral agencies.

The Committee notes the Government’s reference to the ILO mission which visited the country in December 2017, and notes the report of the mission subsequently transmitted to the Government. The Committee notes that according to the report of the ILO mission, the reform in the area of OSH has adversely impacted staff retention and the conditions of service of inspectors. The staff of some of the sectoral agencies do not have the status of civil servants and the transfer of 36 labour inspectors from the SLI to the agencies resulted in half of the transferred inspectors resigning. The report further indicated that not all of the sectoral agencies with OSH responsibilities had yet been established, and they did not all have territorial or local units, which risked certain sectors and workers not being covered, or the offices not being easily accessible to concerned parties. Recalling the importance of ensuring that organizational changes are carried out in conformity with the provisions of Conventions Nos 81 and 129, including Articles 4, 6, 9, 10, 11 and 16 of Convention No. 81 and Articles 7, 8, 11, 14, 15 and 21 of Convention No. 129, the Committee once again urges the Government to take all necessary measures in that respect. The Committee accordingly requests the Government to provide specific information on the concrete measures taken to ensure coordination among the various sectoral agencies, as well as between these agencies and the SLI, including further steps taken to ensure monitoring by the SLI of the implementation of OSH inspection visits. Furthermore, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on: (1) the number of inspectors appointed in the sectoral agencies as well as the number of inspections undertaken by them (Articles 10 and 16 of Convention No. 81 and Articles 14 and 21 of Convention No. 129); (2) how the independence and impartiality of inspectors appointed in the sectoral agencies is ensured in light of their reporting to the management of the sectoral agencies, and progress in providing all inspectors the status of civil servants (Article 6 of Convention No. 81 and Article 8 of Convention No. 129); (3) further steps taken to ensure that inspectors are adequately trained, including the establishment of an e-learning system; (4) the manner in which technical occupational safety and health experts and specialists are associated in the work of inspection (Article 9 of Convention No. 81 and Article 11 of Convention No. 129); and (5) the measures taken to provide such inspectors with suitably equipped local offices (including in sectors covered by agencies currently without local offices) as well as the transport facilities necessary for the performance of their duties (Article 11 of Convention No. 81 and Article 15 of Convention No. 129). It also requests the Government to indicate if all of the sectoral agencies to which inspection functions have been assigned have now been established, and to provide information on the monitoring of enterprises not covered by the respective sectoral agencies. Lastly, the Committee requests the Government to take measures to ensure that the activities of OSH inspectors in the sectoral agencies are separately reflected in the annual report on labour inspection, with respect to all subjects covered in Article 21 of Convention No. 81 and Article 27 of Convention No. 129.

Articles 5(a), 17 and 18 of Convention No. 81 and Articles 12(1), 23 and 24 of Convention No. 129. Cooperation with the justice system and adequate penalties for violations of the legal provisions enforceable by labour inspectors. The Committee notes the Government’s reference, in response to the Committee’s request concerning the significant decline between 2012 and 2016 in the number of infringement reports submitted to courts (from 891 to 165 such reports), to the decrease in the number of entities subjected to inspection visits since the adoption of Law No. 131 in 2012. The Government also refers to the six-month moratorium on state inspection that took place in 2016. The Government indicates that in 2017, the Contravention Code was amended to introduce a section on violations of OSH provisions by the employer, and that it therefore expects the number of infringement reports produced by inspectors to increase in the future. In this respect, the Committee notes the information in the 2017 annual labour inspection report that there was a slight increase in the number of reports submitted to courts by inspectors, rising from 165 in 2016 to 197 in 2017. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on the number of infringement reports submitted to courts, indicating the number of such reports submitted by SLI inspectors and, separately, by OSH inspectors in the sectoral agencies. In addition, and noting an absence of information in response to the Committee’s previous request, it once again requests the Government to provide information on the specific outcome of the infringement reports submitted to the courts, indicating the decision rendered and if any fine or other penalty was applied.

Article 5(b) of Convention No. 81 and Article 13 of Convention No. 129. Collaboration of the labour inspection services with employers and workers or their representatives. The Committee notes the Government’s indication that the functioning of the OSH system was subject to discussions within the National Commission for Collective Consultations and Negotiations. In this respect, the Committee notes the statement of the CNSM that in April 2018, the National Commission for Collective Consultations and Negotiations requested that the Ministry of Economy and Infrastructure create a working group with the participation of the competent institutions in the field of OSH and representatives of employers and the trade unions, with a view to identifying solutions for the existing issues relating to the functioning of the authorities in the field of OSH. The CNSM indicates that subsequently, no working group was established. The Committee requests the Government to provide further information on the measures taken to promote effective dialogue with employers’ and workers’ organisations concerning labour inspection matters, including in particular dialogue on OSH concerns. It also requests the Government to provide information on the consultations undertaken in this respect in the National Commission for Collective Consultations and Negotiations, as well as the measures taken following such consultations.

Article 12 of Convention No. 81 and Article 16 of Convention No. 129. Unannounced inspection visits. The Committee previously noted the application of Law No. 131 to the SLI (pursuant to paragraph 27 of its annex) and that section 18(1) of the Law provides that notice of a decision to carry out a control shall be sent to an enterprise at least five working days prior to the carrying out of the control. Section 18(2) provides that this notice is not provided in the case of an unannounced control, and section 19 outlines the specific limited circumstances under which an unannounced control can be undertaken irrespective of the established schedule of control. In this respect, the Committee noted the statement of the Government that there was a contradiction between the general rules for initiating an inspection (sections 14 and 20–
The Committee notes that the CAS recommended that the Government bring national legislation and practice into line with Conventions Nos 81 and 129 to enable labour inspectors to carry out visits to workplaces liable to inspection without prior notice in order to guarantee adequate and effective supervision. The Committee notes with interest that by virtue of Law No. 185 of 2017, section LXXXV, section 16 of Law No. 131 was amended to specifically exclude the application of section 18 of the Law to inspections undertaken in the area of labour relations and OSH. It further notes that section LXVII of Law No. 185 amends section 23 of the OSH Law (No. 186/2008) to provide that labour inspectors in the field of OSH shall have the power to enter workplaces freely at any time of the day or night, without prior notification of the employer. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the impact of these amendments on the undertaking of inspections without prior notice in practice, including information on the number of labour inspections undertaken with and without the provision of prior notice by inspectors identified separately for the SLI and the sectoral agencies as well as the violations found and sanctions imposed for both announced and unannounced inspections, again identified separately for the SLI and the sectoral agencies.

Articles 15(c) and 16 of Convention No. 81 and Articles 20(c) and 21 of Convention No. 129. Confidentiality concerning the fact that an inspection visit was made in response to the receipt of a complaint. The Committee previously noted information from the Government which indicated that unscheduled inspections (which had been the only inspections undertaken without prior notice, by virtue of Law No. 131) were only undertaken as a result of a complaint or to conduct an investigation following an accident.

The Committee notes that the annual labour inspection report of 2017 once again refers to unscheduled inspections as those relating to complaints received or following an accident. The Committee notes, however, the Government’s indication that the OSH Law (No. 186/2008) was amended in 2017 to provide for the obligation of labour inspectors to keep the confidentiality of any complaint received relating to OSH, as well as not to disclose to the employer the fact that an inspection was carried out as a result of a complaint. Noting the removal of the requirement to provide prior notice for regular inspections and referring to its comments above under Article 12, the Committee requests the Government to provide further information on any additional measures taken to ensure that a sufficient number of inspections without prior notice are undertaken to ensure that when inspections are conducted as a result of a complaint, the fact of the complaint as well as the identity of the complainant(s) is kept confidential. It requests the Government to indicate the number of inspections carried out without prior notice that were not undertaken as a result of a complaint or following the occurrence of an accident.

Article 16 of Convention No. 81 and Article 21 of Convention No. 129. Undertaking of inspections as often as is necessary to ensure the effective application of the relevant legal provisions. The Committee previously noted that certain provisions of Law No. 131 were not compatible with Article 16 of Convention No. 81 and Article 21 of Convention No. 129 on the carrying out of inspections as often and as thoroughly as is necessary to ensure the effective application of the relevant legal provisions. Section 3(g) of Law No. 131 provides that inspections can only be carried out when other means to verify compliance with the law have been exhausted. Pursuant to section 14, control bodies are not entitled to perform a control of the same entity more than once in a calendar year, with the exception of unannounced inspections. Pursuant to sections 7 and 19, Law No. 131 permits unscheduled inspections only under certain specific conditions: they are subject to a delegation of control signed by the head authority vested with control functions; they cannot be carried out on the basis of unverified information and information received from anonymous sources; and they cannot be conducted when there are any other direct or indirect ways to obtain the information needed.

The Committee recalls that the CAS requested the Government, in June 2018, to ensure that inspections are proportionate to the legitimate aim pursued and are possible as often as necessary.

The Committee notes the observations by the ITUC that Law No. 131 substantially reduced the capacity of labour inspectors by limiting the frequency of inspections in individual firms. The Committee also notes with concern the Government’s statement in its report that following the adoption of Law No. 131, the number of entities subjected to inspection visits decreased annually. The Committee further notes the information in the 2017 annual labour inspection report that the number of unscheduled inspections (based on complaints or following an accident) was 545 in 2017, indicating a further decrease from the 1,317 unscheduled inspections undertaken in 2015 and 610 such inspections in 2016. Only ten follow-up inspections were undertaken in 2017, in comparison to 117 such inspections in 2015 and 42 in 2016. The Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the national legislation is amended in the near future to allow for the undertaking of labour inspections as often and as thoroughly as is necessary to ensure the effective application of the relevant legal provisions, in conformity with Article 16 of Convention No. 81 and Article 21 of Convention No. 129.

Article 17 of Convention No. 81 and Article 22 of Convention No. 129. Prompt legal or administrative proceedings. The Committee previously noted that section 4(1) of Law No. 131 provides that inspections during the first three years of the operation of a company/employer shall be of a consultative nature. Section 5(4) provides that, in such cases, in the event of minor violations, the sanctions provided for in the Administrative Offence Law or other laws may not be applied and section 5(5) provides that “restrictive measures” may not be applied in the event of severe violations.
The Committee notes the observations of the ITUC that Law No. 131 introduces a free pass for companies in the first three years of their operation by stipulating that sanctions cannot be applied in the case of minor offences for this period. The Committee once again recalls that Article 17 of Convention No. 81 and Article 22 of Convention No. 129 provide that, with certain exceptions (not directed at new operations), legal provisions enforceable by labour inspectors shall be liable to prompt legal proceedings without previous warning, and that it must be left to the discretion of labour inspectors to give a warning or advice instead of instituting or recommending proceedings. Noting with regret the absence of a reply to its previous request, the Committee urges the Government to provide information on the measures taken to ensure that labour inspectors are able to initiate or recommend immediate legal proceedings. It once again requests the Government to provide information on the meaning of “restrictive measures” that are prohibited from being imposed under Law No. 131, the number and nature of severe violations detected by inspectors, the sanctions proposed by inspectors, and the penalties ultimately applied.

Issues specifically concerning labour inspection in agriculture

Article 9(3) of Convention No. 129. Adequate training for labour inspectors in agriculture. The Committee notes the information provided by the Government, in response to the Committee’s previous request, that the National Agency for Food Safety is in charge of OSH inspections in agriculture. The Government indicates that labour inspectors at the Agency shall carry out inspections in cooperation with other field inspectors of the Agency. The Committee also notes the information provided by the Government on the measures planned to provide general OSH training to inspectors of the sectoral agencies. The Committee once again requests the Government to provide information on the training provided to labour inspectors that relates specifically to their duties in the agricultural sector, including the number of training programmes organized for inspectors of the National Agency for Food Safety with OSH functions, the subjects covered in these programmes and the number of inspectors who participated in these programmes. [The Government is asked to reply in full to the present comments in 2019.]

Articles 4(2), 5(a), 10 and 16 of the Convention. Supervision and control by central labour inspection authorities at the provincial levels. Number of labour inspectors and labour inspections. The Committee previously noted from the 2016 national occupational safety and health (OSH) profile published by the Ministry of Overseas Pakistanis and Human Resources Development that there continued to be a serious shortage of labour inspectors in relation to the number of workplaces liable to inspection. One of the recommendations in that profile concerned the creation of independent labour inspection authorities (separate from the provincial labour departments currently acting as central authorities) at the provincial levels with sufficient human and financial resources. The Committee notes the Government’s indication that during its previous request, that there are currently no resources to set up independent labour inspection entities at the provincial levels, but that it is proposed to increase the number of labour inspectors in all provinces. The Government indicates that: (i) in Khyber Pakhtunkhwa, it is proposed to recruit 41 new inspection staff (in addition to the existing 108); (ii) in Punjab, it is recommended to increase the current number of labour inspectors from 71 to 95; (iii) in Balochistan, there are constant efforts to increase the number of labour inspectors every year; and (iv) in Sindh, it is proposed to improve the labour inspection system and increase the number of labour inspection visits in the area of OSH. The Committee once again urges the Government to pursue its efforts to increase the number of labour inspectors, to provide information on the resources committed and concrete measures taken in this respect, and to provide detailed information on the number of labour inspectors in each province. Recalling that the labour inspection system shall be placed under the supervision of the central authority, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on any measures taken or envisaged to strengthen the central authority, including measures to give effect to the recommendations in the national OSH profile to create independent labour inspection authorities.

Coverage of workplaces by labour inspections. Private auditing firms. The Committee previously noted that during the discussion in the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards (CAS) in 2014, some speakers expressed concern with regard to the carrying out of third-party inspections by private auditing firms, and it subsequently noted the Government’s statement that the outsourcing of responsibilities towards those firms had to change. Concerning its previous request on the operation of private auditing firms, the Committee notes the Government’s indication that in Sindh, the applicable legislation does not permit the conduct of inspections by private auditing firms. The Committee also notes the Government’s statement that private and public auditing firms (which are accredited by the Pakistan National Accreditation Council (PNAC)) might be a useful means in strengthening the labour inspection system, and that the PNAC regularly conducts surveillance to ensure that these firms have the necessary capacity. In this respect, the Committee would once again like to emphasize that while private auditing may contribute to addressing compliance gaps, such initiatives may only be complementary to, but not replace, public labour inspection. Because the Government has not provided a response in this respect, the Committee once again requests the Government to provide information on whether the enterprises that have been subject to compliance assessments by private auditing firms continue to be liable to labour inspection in law and practice. It requests the Government to provide more detailed information on the surveillance measures undertaken by the PNAC to guarantee independent compliance assessments by these firms. The Committee also once again requests the Government to provide information on whether the Government promotes cooperation between the labour inspection services and the private auditing firms.

Article 12(1). Free access of labour inspectors to workplaces. The Committee previously noted with concern the Government’s indication that since 2001, under administrative order, a letter is issued by the Chief Inspector of Factories (Director of Labour) to a factory prior to an inspection in the province of Sindh, which contains the date and time of the visit. It also noted the observations made by the Pakistan Workers’ Federation (PWF) that labour inspections had practically been discontinued in the province of Sindh and that 2.3 million workers in that province suffered from occupational accidents every year. The Committee further noted from the 2016 OSH profile, that restrictions in the form of prior notice appeared to continue to be a problem in some areas in Punjab. In this respect, the Committee notes with concern that the 2017 Sindh Occupational Safety and Health Act does not give effect to Article 12 of the Convention in that section 19 of that Act does not empower labour inspectors to enter freely and without previous notice at any hour of the day or night any workplace liable to inspection, and that it restricts the conduct of inspection visits to “any reasonable time” (and only permits entry “at any time” in situations that are or may be dangerous). The Committee also notes the Government’s statement that prior notice for inspection is in no way in conflict with free access. The Government states that there is no obligation in the legislation to issue notices prior to inspections; however it indicates that such notifications are useful means to ensure that employers are not “unduly harassed” and that the “high handedness” of labour inspectors may be curbed that way. The Committee would like to recall from its 2006 General Survey on Labour inspection, paragraph 263, the Committee indicated that unannounced visits enable the inspector to enter the inspected premises without warning the employer or his or her representative in advance, especially in cases where the employer may be expected to attempt to conceal a violation, by changing the usual conditions of work, preventing a witness from being present or making it impossible to carry out an inspection. The Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures, in accordance with Article 12(1)(a) and (b), to empower labour inspectors to enter freely and without previous notice at any hour of the day or night any workplace liable to inspection, and to enable the conduct of a sufficient number of unannounced inspection visits in practice in the province of Sindh. Noting that the Government has not provided the requested information, the Committee once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that labour inspectors in the province of Punjab are empowered to enter any workplace liable to inspection freely and without previous notice at any hour of the day or night. Further, noting that the Government has not provided the requested statistics, the Committee also once again requests the Government to provide information on the number of inspections conducted without prior notice in the provinces of Sindh and Punjab (compared with the numbers conducted with prior notice), including any violations detected, sanctions applied, and corrective measures taken as a result of inspections conducted without prior notice.

Articles 17 and 18. Effective enforcement. The Committee previously noted the observations made by the PWF that the enforcement activities of the labour inspectorate were trivial. It also noted the trade union’s reference to statistics showing that in Sindh, only 12 penalties were imposed in 2014, although there were 8,572 factories registered in that province. The Committee notes that the Government provides the requested statistical information, in response to the Committee’s request, with regard to the province of Punjab (during the period of 2017–18), on the number of violations detected, the number of violations which resulted in prosecution and the value of fines imposed (10,515 inspections resulting in 16,139 prosecutions and 1,814,530 Pakistan rupees in fines (approximately US$13,571)). The Committee notes with regret, however, that the Government does not provide the requested statistical information in relation to the other provinces. The Committee urges the Government to provide information in relation to each of the provinces on the number of violations detected, the corresponding number of violations which resulted in prosecution, and subsequent convictions, and both the number and average amount level of the fines imposed.

Sufficiently dissuasive penalties. The Committee notes that the Government refers, in reply to the Committee’s request for information on the progress made concerning the adoption of draft legislation providing for increased penalties in Balochistan, to two pieces of draft legislation pending approval by the new cabinet in that province. The Committee also notes from the information provided by the Government that there are no changes to the penalties provided for under the Mines Acts, 1923 in the provinces. However, the Committee notes that one of the recommendations during a meeting of the Chief Inspectors of Mines in June 2018 in the framework of the ILO project on Strengthening the Labour Inspection System in Pakistan, concerned the updating of the legislative framework governing the mining sector. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on the progress made with respect to increasing the level of fines and other penalties in the legislation of the province of Balochistan, and to provide information on any changes made to the penalties for labour law violations provided for in the Mines Acts of each of the provinces.

Article 18. Penalties for obstructing labour inspectors in the performance of their duties. The Committee previously noted that during the discussion in the CAS in 2014, several speakers indicated that penalties for the obstruction of labour inspectors in their duties were insufficient. In this respect, the Government previously noted that three provinces (Punjab, Khyber Pakhtunkhwa and Sindh) had revised their respective Factories Acts to increase the fines for obstructing the work of inspectors, and that it was also proposed to increase the relevant penalties in the Factories Act of Balochistan.
The Committee notes the information provided by the Government in response to its request that the increased fines for obstruction in Punjab (20,000 Pakistani Rupee, approximately US$149) have already resulted in fewer instances of obstruction of labour inspectors, and that some instances of obstruction were penalized with fines. The Committee notes the Government’s indication that it is not possible to provide disaggregated information on the obstruction of labour inspectors in Khyber Pakhtunkhwa, and the Committee observes that the Government has not provided any relevant information in relation to the provinces of Sindh and Balochistan. The Committee requests the Government to continue to take measures to ensure that the legislation in the province of Balochistan provides for sufficiently dissuasive sanctions for the obstruction of labour inspectors in their duties. The Committee once again requests the Government to provide detailed information on the applicable penalties concerning cases of obstruction provided for in the Mines Acts in the provinces. Noting that the Government has provided general information in relation to one province, and no information in relation to the other provinces, the Committee also once again requests the Government to make every effort to provide information on cases relating to the obstruction of labour inspectors in their duties in practice, in relation to each of the provinces, including the specific number of instances of obstruction, the number of prosecutions undertaken, their outcome and the specific penalties applied (including the amount of fines imposed).

Articles 20 and 21. Publication of an annual inspection report. The Committee notes that once again no annual report on the work of the labour inspection services has been communicated to the Office. It notes the Government’s indication that the Ministry of Overseas Pakistanis and Human Resources Development is working on the compilation of the annual labour inspection report in coordination with the provinces, and that the report will be submitted once all the information is available. The Committee urges the Government to pursue its efforts to ensure that the central labour inspection authority in each province publishes an annual labour inspection report, pursuant to Article 20, and that these reports are communicated to the ILO, either separately or in a compiled form, pursuant to Article 20(3). It also once again encourages the Government to take the necessary steps to ensure that the annual report(s) contain(s) full information on the subjects set forth in Article 21.

In order to provide a comprehensive view of the issues relating to the application of ratified conventions on labour inspection, the Committee considers it appropriate to examine Conventions Nos 81 (labour inspection) and 129 (labour inspection in agriculture) together.

Article 3(1) and (2) of Convention No. 81 and Article 6(1) and (3) of Convention No. 129. Labour inspection activities for the protection of foreign workers in an irregular situation and additional functions entrusted to labour inspectors. The Committee notes the Government’s indication, in reply to its previous request, that the Border Guard (BG) is gradually taking over the controls in the area of legality regarding employment of foreigners. The Government indicates that after the adoption of the Polish Migration Policy in 2014, the focus of cooperation between the National Labour Inspectorate (NLI) and the BG is moving from jointly monitoring illegal employment to exchanging experiences, good practices and the interpretation of regulations. The Committee notes that once again no annual inspection report and the 2015 annual inspection report submitted in 2016, this shift resulted in labour inspections focusing more on issues directly concerning the protection of workers’ rights. According to the statistics contained in the Government’s report and the 2015 annual inspection report submitted in 2016, this shift resulted in labour inspections focusing more on controlling the legality of employment of Polish citizens: around 23,000 out of a total of 90,000 inspections performed by the NLI in 2015 focused on the legality of employment and other paid work of Polish citizens. This resulted in the detection of illegal employment of around 21,000 workers, including over 13,000 purported independent contractors. The Committee welcomes the indication that more than 8,000 of those workers obtained employment contracts through the annual labour inspection report in coordination with the provinces, and that the report will be submitted once all the information is available.

The Committee notes the information provided by the Government in response to its request that the increased fines for obstruction in Punjab (20,000 Pakistani Rupee, approximately US$149) have already resulted in fewer instances of obstruction of labour inspectors, and that some instances of obstruction were penalized with fines. The Committee notes the Government’s indication that it is not possible to provide disaggregated information on the obstruction of labour inspectors in Khyber Pakhtunkhwa, and the Committee observes that the Government has not provided any relevant information in relation to the provinces of Sindh and Balochistan. Articles 20 and 21. Publication of an annual inspection report. The Committee notes that once again no annual report on the work of the labour inspection services has been communicated to the Office. It notes the Government’s indication that the Ministry of Overseas Pakistanis and Human Resources Development is working on the compilation of the annual labour inspection report in coordination with the provinces, and that the report will be submitted once all the information is available. Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) (ratification: 1995)

In order to provide a comprehensive view of the issues relating to the application of ratified conventions on labour inspection, the Committee considers it appropriate to examine Conventions Nos 81 (labour inspection) and 129 (labour inspection in agriculture) together.

Article 3(1) and (2) of Convention No. 81 and Article 6(1) and (3) of Convention No. 129. The Committee notes the Government’s indication, in reply to its previous request, that the Border Guard (BG) is gradually taking over the controls in the area of legality regarding employment of foreigners. The Government indicates that after the adoption of the Polish Migration Policy in 2014, the focus of cooperation between the National Labour Inspectorate (NLI) and the BG is moving from jointly monitoring illegal employment to exchanging experiences, good practices and the interpretation of regulations. The Government states that this shall enable the NLI to focus more on issues directly concerning the protection of workers’ rights. According to the statistics contained in the Government’s report and the 2015 annual inspection report submitted in 2016, this shift resulted in labour inspections focusing more on controlling the legality of employment of Polish citizens: around 23,000 out of a total of 90,000 inspections performed by the NLI in 2015 focused on the legality of employment and other paid work of Polish citizens. Articles 20 and 21. Publication of an annual inspection report. The Committee notes that once again no annual report on the work of the labour inspection services has been communicated to the Office. It notes the Government’s indication that the Ministry of Overseas Pakistanis and Human Resources Development is working on the compilation of the annual labour inspection report in coordination with the provinces, and that the report will be submitted once all the information is available. It also once again encourages the Government to take the necessary steps to ensure that the annual report(s) contain(s) full information on the subjects set forth in Article 21.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.
General Survey, Labour inspection, paragraph 77, it indicated that neither Convention No. 81 nor Convention No. 129 contain any provision suggesting that any worker be excluded from the protection afforded by labour inspection on account of their irregular employment status. The Committee further recalls its observation on the application of the Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) in which it requested the Government to take the necessary measures to enable migrant workers to approach the competent authorities and seek redress in the event of a violation of their rights or abuses, without fear of retaliation. Noting the Government’s efforts to relieve the inspectorate of the task of monitoring illegal employment of foreign workers by transferring it to the BG, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the manner in which the labour inspection services ensure the enforcement of employers’ obligations with regard to the statutory rights of foreign workers, including those in an irregular situation, resulting from their existing and past work (such as wages and social security benefits).

Articles 5(a), 17 and 18 of Convention No. 81 and Articles 12, 22 and 23 of Convention No. 129. Sanctions and effective enforcement. Cooperation between the inspection services and the judiciary. The Committee takes note of the information provided by the Government in reply to its previous comments, on the number of notifications of a suspected crime made by labour inspectors to the Office of the Public Prosecutor (PO). However, it notes that nearly 75 per cent of notifications to the PO concerning suspicions of criminal offenses did not result in proceedings. The Government indicates that labour inspectors can file complaints or make requests for justification of the PO’s refusal to initiate proceedings, and that inspectors submitted 131 such complaints in 2015. Noting that most cases transmitted to the PO do not result in proceedings, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken or envisaged to enhance effective cooperation between the labour inspection services and the judicial system. The Committee further requests the Government to provide information on the reasons why the PO declined to proceed, suspended, or discontinued cases, and whether the PO communicates these concerns, or seeks additional information from inspectors, prior to its final decision not to proceed. It also requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken to ensure that labour inspectors receive appropriate training on the preparation of notifications to the PO and are systematically informed about the outcome of the cases notified.

Articles 2(1), 5(a), 12(1), and 16 of Convention No. 81 and Articles 4, 12, 16(1) and 21 of Convention No. 129. Coverage of workplaces by labour inspections. Restrictions on collaboration between labour inspection officials and other public institutions and on inspectors entering workplaces freely. The Committee previously noted the Government’s indications concerning the restrictions set forth in Chapter 5 of the Act on Freedom of Economic Activity (AFE) providing that inspections require an authorization indicating the subject of the control, and that the scope of the control cannot be exceeded during inspections. The Committee takes note that the AFE was amended in 2015 to provide that certain restrictions would not apply if ratified international agreements provide otherwise. However, it notes with concern the Government’s indication that the application of the provisions of the AFE to the NLI poses various difficulties in practice.

The Committee takes due note that the requirement in section 79-2(1) of the AFE of prior notification to carry out inspections does not apply to labour inspection, in light of the obligations under Conventions Nos 81 and 129. It however notes that section 79(a) requires labour inspectors to obtain and present authorization from the labour inspectorate to the entrepreneur or his/her representative, except for serious cases where authorization can be presented within three days after initiating the inspection. The Government states that obtaining this authorization can increase the time-consuming nature of activities before the start of an inspection and limits the mobility of labour inspectors. It poses practical difficulties in inspecting an entire workplace with more than two entrepreneurs or subcontractors, and often makes it difficult to conduct controls without an agreement from the entrepreneur. The Government also indicates that the AFEA prevents labour inspectors from carrying out joint inspections with other public authorities charged with supervising working conditions (such as the State Sanitary Inspectorate and the Road Transport Inspectorate). The Government further indicates that the AFEA requires carrying out inspections at the headquarters of the entrepreneur or place of business, which severely limits the possibility of monitoring entrepreneurs engaged in economic activities using their home address. The Committee also notes the detailed information provided by the Government on the various administrative court decisions on the application of the AFEA to the NLI and takes note of the Government’s indication that there is a risk that evidence collected as a result of inspections may be regarded in violation of the AFEA. The Committee urges the Government to take measures to address the limitations on the work of the labour inspectorate related to prior authorization, inspecting workplaces with multiple employers and the conduct of joint inspections, in accordance with Articles 12 and 16 of the Convention No. 81 and Articles 16 and 21 of the Convention No. 129. It requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken in this respect, and to continue to provide information on the impact of the AFEA on labour inspection activities.

Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) (ratification: 1976)

Technical cooperation. Following its previous comments, the Committee welcomes the information in the Government’s report concerning the measures planned within the context of the technical cooperation programme between the Government and the ILO, particularly the second pillar which concerns improving the labour inspection and occupational safety and health (OSH) systems. The Committee takes due note of the Government’s indication that an assessment of the labour inspection system was conducted by the ILO to identify the technical needs of the system, which will be finalized by the end of 2018. The Committee requests the Government to provide detailed information on the measures taken to implement the recommendations of the assessment, once finalized, with a view to improving the implementation of the Convention.

Articles 3, 8, 10 and 16 of the Convention. Sufficient number of labour inspectors and coverage of workplaces. The Committee previously noted that the technical cooperation programme between the Government and the ILO includes the implementation of a labour inspection policy and strategy, increasing the number of interpreters accompanying inspectors in order to permit interaction with workers during inspection visits, and measures to ensure that inspections cover all undertakings and workplaces prescribed by the Labour Law.

The Committee welcomes the Government’s statement that the national labour inspection policy has been formulated, and is in the process of being developed and that a strategic unit was established within the Labour Inspection Department to oversee the development of modern strategic inspection plans. The Government also indicates that an inspection plan was prepared in 2018, with a view to covering all workplaces in the country. The Committee welcomes the Government’s further indication that there are now 12 interpreters in the Labour Inspection Department (an increase from the four previously noted by the Committee), able to speak the most common languages among migrant workers, and that the number of inspectors able to speak both Arabic and English has increased to 100 (from the 96 previously noted). There are currently 255 labour inspectors, ten administrative supervisors and five technical supervisors. The Committee notes that this represents a decrease in the number of labour inspectors previously noted by the Committee, and also notes the Government’s statement that this is due to a change in the Ministry’s structure in March 2016, the transfer of some inspectors to the Wage Protection Department as well as a focus by the Ministry of Administrative Development, Labour and Social Affairs on developing inspectors’ performance instead of focusing on the number of inspectors.

The Committee notes the Government’s indication that in the first eight months of 2018, 27,771 inspections were undertaken (13,855 labour inspections and 13,916 OSH inspections), resulting in 3,475 warnings to remedy a violation and 1,235 infringement reports. Approximately 70 per cent of inspections found no violations, and another 10 per cent resulted in the provision of guidance and advice. The Government indicates that most inspections undertaken were proactive and unannounced (22,410), and that 2,119 follow-up inspections were undertaken. The Committee requests the Government to pursue its efforts to develop and implement a clear and coherent national labour inspection policy, aimed at ensuring the protection of workers. Noting that no violations were detected during the majority of inspections, the Committee urges the Government to pursue its efforts with respect to strategic planning and the development of modern strategic inspection plans, and to provide further information on the manner in which it identifies priorities and targets for inspection. It also requests the Government to continue to provide information on measures taken to ensure the recruitment of labour inspectors and interpreters able to speak the languages of migrant workers, and on the number of labour inspectors, disaggregated by gender. Lastly, it requests the Government to continue to take measures to increase the coverage of inspection visits, including smaller workplaces employing vulnerable migrant workers, and to continue to provide information on the total number of inspections undertaken, specifically disaggregated between announced, unannounced and routine, and also between complaint-based, accident-based and follow-up inspections.

Articles 5(a), 17, 18 and 21(e). Effective cooperation between the labour inspectorate and the justice system, legal proceedings and effective enforcement of adequate penalties. The Committee previously noted a report commissioned by the Government recommending bolstering the powers of labour inspectors who, upon detecting non-compliance, only have the power to draw up infringement reports. These infringement reports are then referred to the courts for further action for any sanction to be applied. The Committee also noted that the outcome of most inspections was no further action and it welcomed the Government’s indication that it was prepared to consider other powers that may be granted to labour inspectors in order to enforce the law. Further, the Committee once again noted that no information had been provided on the specific penalties applied in cases where decisions had been handed down by courts.

The Committee notes the information provided by the Government in response to its previous request, concerning the increase in the number of infringement reports referred to courts which was 676 in 2015, 1,142 in 2016, 657 in the first six months of 2017 and 1,235 in the first eight months of 2018. The Committee also notes the statement in the Government’s report that it will communicate statistics on the outcome of cases referred to the judiciary by the Labour Inspection Department, but notes with regret that no such information has been provided despite the repeated requests from the Committee. The Committee notes the Government’s indication that the technical cooperation between the Government and the ILO includes a review of relevant legislation in order to strengthen the enforcement powers of labour inspectors and their collaboration with the judicial system in line with the Committee’s recommendations. The Committee requests the Government to take steps, in the context of the ongoing technical cooperation, to strengthen the effectiveness of enforcement mechanisms, including measures to provide enhanced enforcement powers to labour inspectors and further measures to promote effective collaboration with the judicial system (including the exchange of information on the outcome of cases referred to courts). In this respect, it once again urges the Government to provide the information requested on the outcome of cases referred to the judiciary by labour inspectors through infringement reports, including the penalties imposed by virtue of the Labour Law (acquittal, fines, including amounts, or prison sentences as applicable) and the legal provisions to which they relate, distinguishing these cases from those brought to court by workers themselves. It also requests the Government to provide comprehensive statistics on the other enforcement activities of the labour inspectorate.

Articles 5(a), 9 and 13. Labour inspection in the area of OSH. OSH inspections and preventive activities of the labour inspectorate. The Committee notes the information provided by the Government in response to its previous request that, in the first eight months of 2018, 13,916 OSH inspections were undertaken in 4,715 companies. The inspections undertaken resulted in 2,778 warnings to remedy infringements, 2,657 issuances of advice on OSH issues and 54 infringement reports. The Committee also notes with concern the Government’s indication that the rate of workers’ deaths in occupational accidents has increased significantly, rising to 117 deaths in 2017 (compared to 35 deaths in 2016, 24 in 2015 and 19 in 2014), and that the statistics provided on fatal accidents are not disaggregated by occupation or sector. The number of workers injured (with serious or moderately serious injuries) in occupational accidents in the first half of 2018 was 238 (compared to 245 during the same period in 2017). The Government indicates that it is taking a number of measures to reduce the rate of occupational injuries and accidents. This includes, in the context of the technical cooperation programme, steps to enhance the OSH system, implementation of an OSH policy, strengthening the training of OSH inspectors and carrying out competency tests for such inspectors, as well as awareness-raising campaigns on the means of prevention against occupational accidents. The Government indicates that these measures are necessary in view of the importance of strengthening the capacity of the Labour Inspection Department with respect to OSH in all sectors, including construction. The Government further indicates that the technical cooperation will include a gap analysis on the Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 1981 (No. 155), with a view to ratifying that instrument. Lastly, the Committee notes the Government’s statement that pursuant to section 100 of the Labour Law, inspectors have the authority to prepare an urgent report, to be referred to the Minister, if they detect an imminent danger in the workplace and that these reports will result in the Minister issuing a decision of partial or total closure until the hazard is removed, while requiring non-compliant employers to pay workers’ wages during the period of closure. The Committee urges the Government to take immediate measures to address the increase in the number of fatal occupational accidents, including further measures to strengthen the capacity of labour inspectors with respect to the monitoring of OSH. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on the number of occupational accidents, including fatal occupational accidents, and to indicate for fatal occupational accidents the occupation or sector concerned (such as construction, energy or hospitality services). It requests the Government to continue to provide information on the preventive activities of the inspectorate and the number and type of OSH inspection visits undertaken (indicating whether they are announced, unannounced, routine, in response to a complaint or to an accident, or follow-up), the number of violations detected, the number of infringement reports issued and, in particular, the information previously requested concerning the follow-up given by the judicial authorities to such infringement reports. The Committee also requests the Government to provide information on the implementation in practice by labour inspectors of the power, in accordance with Article 13, to make orders requiring measures with immediate executory force in the event of imminent danger to the health or safety of the workers, indicating the number of urgent reports and closure decisions issued under section 100 of the Labour Law.

OSH in the construction sector. The Committee previously noted that the Supreme Committee for Delivery and Legacy and the Ministry of Administrative Development and Labour and Social Affairs concluded a Memorandum of Understanding (MoU) with Building and Wood Workers’ International (BWI) with the goal of protecting the OSH of workers in 2022 World Cup projects, and that joint field visits with BWI began in 2017. The Committee notes the statistical information provided by the Government on the inspection visits undertaken to 2022 World Cup project sites. The Committee also notes the Government’s statement that collaboration with BWI is ongoing in order to review and evaluate training systems on OSH, but it observes an absence of information in reply to the Committee’s previous request on any further joint inspections undertaken. The Committee further notes the Government’s indication that approximately 50 per cent of occupational accidents in the first half of 2018 (118 out of 238 accidents) were caused by falls, a slight increase from the same period in 2017 (110 accidents representing 45 per cent). The Committee urges the Government to continue to strengthen the capacity of the labour inspectorate with respect to OSH in the construction sector and to provide information on the measures taken in that respect, including capacity building for OSH inspectors related to preventive measures protecting against falls from heights. In addition, the Committee once again requests the Government to provide detailed statistics on the number of joint inspections undertaken under the MoU with BWI and on their outcome.

Article 7. Recruitment and training of labour inspectors. The Committee notes the information provided by the Government on the training provided to labour inspectors in the first six months of 2018, including the number of participants and the type of training. It also notes the Government’s indication that training is one of the major elements of the technical cooperation between the Government and the ILO, and that this includes an analysis of training needs of inspectors and the formulation of a training plan. The Committee notes the Government’s statement that achieving enforcement of the Labour Law and its observance requires building the capacities of labour inspectors. The Committee further takes due note of a number of study visits planned for inspectors to learn about other systems of inspection, as well as an MoU signed with the United Kingdom Health and Safety Executive with respect to some of the capacity-building and development needs of inspectors. The Committee requests the Government to pursue its efforts to ensure that inspectors receive adequate training for the performance of their duties (noting that the total number of participants in training for the first six months of 2018 was less than one half of all inspectors). It requests the Government to continue to provide information on the training provided, including within the framework of the technical cooperation programme, specifying the number of labour inspectors that received training, the duration of such training and the subjects covered. It also requests the Government to provide further information on the recruitment process for labour inspectors, including the qualifications required and the induction training provided to new inspectors.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Labour Inspection (Agriculture) Convention, 1969 (No. 129) (ratification: 1975)

In order to provide a comprehensive view of the issues relating to the application of ratified Conventions on labour inspection, the Committee considers it appropriate to examine Conventions Nos 81 (labour inspection) and 129 (labour inspection in agriculture) together.

Article 3(1) and (2) of Convention No. 81 and Article 6(1) and (3) of Convention No. 129. Control of undeclared work and the protection of foreign workers in an irregular situation. The Committee notes that, in accordance with the new Government Ordinance (GO) No. 488/2017 on the organization and functioning of the labour inspectorate, labour inspectors are entrusted with detecting undeclared work of foreign or posted workers (section 12) and perform inspections separately from, as well as in collaboration with, the General Inspectorate for Immigration. GO No. 488/2017 provides that employers bear liability, including joint and several liability, to principal and intermediate subcontractors for overdue wages of foreign workers engaged in undeclared work, including those in an irregular situation. The annual labour inspection report for 2017 indicates that in 2017, a total of 1,210 controls related to undeclared work of foreign workers were carried out and 37 sanctions (including warnings) and 111 measures were ordered. However, the Committee notes that the Government’s report does not indicate whether such orders include those requiring the establishment of employment contracts or ensuring other statutory rights granted to foreign nationals engaged in undeclared work, such as the payment of overdue wages and other benefits resulting from their work. The Committee recalls that the functions of the system of labour inspection are to secure the enforcement of the legal provisions relating to conditions of work and the protection of workers while engaged in their work, and that any further duties which may be entrusted to labour inspectors shall not be such as to interfere with the effective discharge of their primary duties. In its 2006 General Survey, Labour inspection, paragraph 78, the Committee indicated that any function of verifying the legality of employment should have as its corollary the reinstatement of the statutory rights of all the workers if it is to be compatible with the objective of labour inspection, which is to protect the rights and interests of all workers and to improve their working conditions. Referring to paragraph 452 of the 2017 General Survey on certain occupational safety and health instruments, the Committee recalls that workers in a vulnerable situation may not be willing to cooperate with the labour inspection services if they fear negative consequences as a result of inspection activities, such as the loss of their job or expulsion from the country. The Committee requests the Government to take specific measures to ensure that the functions assigned to labour inspectors do not interfere with the main objective of labour inspectors to ensure the protection of workers in accordance with labour inspectors’ primary duties as set forth in Article 3(2) of Convention No. 81 and Article 6(3) of Convention No. 129. It requests the Government to provide information on measures undertaken by the inspectorate to ensure the enforcement of the rights of foreign workers found to be in an irregular situation. It further requests the Government to provide information on the number of cases in which workers found to be in an irregular situation have been granted their due rights, such as the payment of outstanding wages or social security benefits, or orders for the establishment of an employment contract.

Articles 3(1), 10 and 16 of the Convention. Number of labour inspectors and coverage of workplaces by labour inspection visits. In its previous comment, the Committee observed that the number of labour inspectors continuously decreased over a number of years. It noted that the Government’s indication that the limited number of staff in 2010 had significantly affected the results and quality of labour inspection. The Committee notes from the statistics provided in the 2016 report of the Federal Service of Labour and Employment (Rostrud) that the number of labour inspectors decreased between 2012 and 2016 from 2,680 to 2,102. It also notes from the same source that the number of labour inspectors is considered to be insufficient to achieve sufficient coverage of workplaces by labour inspection visits, which often results in the verification and control of documents from the offices of the Rostrud rather than the conduct of actual labour inspection visits in workplaces. The Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure the recruitment of an adequate number of labour inspectors to ensure that workplaces are inspected as often and as thoroughly as is necessary to enable the effective application of the relevant legal provisions. It requests the Government to continue to provide information on the number of labour inspectors.

Articles 12 and 16. Labour inspection powers and prerogatives. The Committee notes the Government’s indication, in reply to the Committee’s request to give full effect to Article 12, that the powers of labour inspectors to ask workers and employers questions provided for in section 357 of the Labour Code are not curtailed by the Federal Law No. 294-FZ of 2008 (as amended in 2014) on the protection of legal entities and individual entrepreneurs in state control (supervision) and municipal control. However, the Committee notes that section 357 only gives labour inspectors the power to interview employers (and not workers) and that Law No. 294-FZ, the Labour Code (as amended) and Regulation No. 875 of 2012 (on state supervision over the observance of labour legislation and other normative legal acts containing labour law provisions) provide for numerous restrictions on the powers of labour inspectors, including the free initiative of labour inspectors to undertake inspections without prior notice (sections 9(12) and 10(16) of Law No. 294-FZ), and the free access of labour inspectors to workplaces (without an order from a higher authority) at any hour of the day or night (sections 10(5) and 18(4) of Law No. 294-FZ). Moreover, these laws and regulations provide for restrictions on the conduct of labour inspections as often and as thoroughly as necessary, including limitations with regard to the grounds on which unscheduled inspection visits may be undertaken (section 360 of the Labour Code, section 10(2) of Law No. 294-FZ and section 10 of Regulation No. 875 of 2012). The Committee further notes that pursuant to section 19(6)(1) and (2) of the Code of Administrative Offences, labour inspectors may incur administrative liability where they fail to observe certain of these restrictions, for example where they undertake labour inspections on grounds other than those permitted in law. Recalling the importance of fully empowering labour inspectors to make visits without previous notice in order to guarantee effective supervision, the Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures to bring the national legislation into compliance with Articles 12 and 16 of the Convention. Particularly, it urges the Government to ensure that labour inspectors are empowered to: (i) make visits without previous notice, in line with Article 12(1)(a) and (b) of the Convention; (ii) to interrogate both employers and staff, in accordance with Article 12(1)(c)(i); and (iii) to allow for the undertaking of labour inspections as often and as thoroughly as is necessary to ensure the effective application of the relevant legal provisions, in accordance with Article 16.

Articles 7, 17 and 18. Enforcement of labour law provisions. The Committee notes the information provided by the Government, in reply to the Committee’s previous request, concerning the causes for the discrepancy between the number of cases reported by the labour inspectorate, the number of investigations initiated and the number of convictions. The Committee notes the Government’s indication that one of the main reasons that criminal cases are not pursued was that criminal intent could not be established (criminal cases were only initiated in one out of the 14 cases reported). The Government further indicates that the reasons that administrative cases are not pursued included that non-compliance reports prepared by the labour inspectorate were incomplete or did not contain the required documents. Moreover, decisions on the closure of administrative cases were often communicated too late for the labour inspectorate to submit appeals within the prescribed time limits. However, in relation to the payment of wages, the Committee notes the Government’s indication in its 2017 report on the application of the Protection of Wages Convention, 1949 (No. 95), that the number of investigations initiated and the number of convictions for cases reported concerning the non-payment of wages has increased.

With regard to the requested information on the enforcement of the legal provisions pertaining to fundamental rights at work, the Committee notes that the Government indicates that the labour inspectorate could not identify evidence for any violations of freedom of association rights. In this context, the Committee also recalls its observation published in 2017 under the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) in which it noted the observations of the Confederation of Labour of the Russian Federation (KTR) concerning a number of deficiencies in the enforcement of the provisions relating to acts of anti-union discrimination, including the lack of training of law enforcement staff concerning the evidence needed to establish violations under the Criminal Code. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure the effective enforcement of the legal provisions enforceable by labour inspectors, and to address the shortcomings it has identified in this regard. It requests the Government to provide information on the concrete measures taken in this respect (such as training for labour inspectors on the establishment and completion of non-compliance reports including the collection of the necessary evidence; the improvement of communication and coordination activities with the judiciary on the required evidence to establish and effectively prosecute labour law violations as well as the need for timely communication of the outcome of cases to the labour inspectorate). The Committee requests the Government to provide detailed statistics on the administrative and criminal cases reported by the labour inspectorate including the relevant legal provisions, the investigations and prosecutions initiated and the penalties imposed as a result.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Legislation. The Committee notes with interest that an Occupational Safety and Health (OSH) Bill has been developed in cooperation with the ILO, which addresses several of the previous points raised by the Committee (such as the powers of labour inspectors provided for under Article 13 of the Convention, the notification of the labour inspectorate of industrial accidents and cases of occupational diseases provided for under Article 14, etc.), and that relevant national consultations with various stakeholders, including employers’ and workers’ representatives, are currently being held. The Committee asks the Government to continue to keep the ILO informed of any progress made in the adoption of this Bill and to communicate a copy of the relevant OSH Act, once adopted. It expresses the hope that this OSH Act will give full effect to the Convention.

Articles 20 and 21 of the Convention. Annual report on the work of the labour inspection services. The Committee notes that, once again, no annual labour inspection report has been received by the Office, nor has any statistical information been communicated by the Government. It notes the Government’s indication according to which ongoing technical assistance is provided by the Office for the implementation of the Labour Market Information System (LMIS) which, as the Committee had previously noted, contains statistics on labour inspection and is intended to be used to record and generate reports on labour inspections. It also notes the Government’s indications that comprehensive statistical labour inspection reports are expected to be published separately as from 2014, provided that inspection data are correctly and regularly entered in the LMIS database. The Committee requests the Government to make every effort, including the training of staff in the use and operation of the LMIS, to allow the central labour authority to publish and communicate to the ILO, together with its next report due in 2016, an annual labour inspection report containing full information as required under Article 21(a)–(g) of the Convention. The Committee recalls that the Government could make use of the guidance provided in Paragraph 9 of the Labour Inspection Recommendation, 1947 (No. 81), concerning the type of information that should be included in a labour inspection report. The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee expects that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

The Committee notes with deep concern that the Government’s report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments initially made in 2012.

Legislation. The Committee requests the Government to indicate any new legal provision relating to matters covered by the Convention and international standards used in designing or revising the concepts, definitions and methods used in the collection, compilation and publication of the statistics required thereby.

Article 2 of the Convention. The Committee asks the Government to provide information on the application of the latest international standards and to specify, for each Article of the Convention for which the obligations were accepted (that is, Articles 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14 and 15), which standards and guidelines are followed.

Article 7. The Committee requests the Government to indicate the concepts, definitions and methodology used to produce the official estimates of labour force, employment and unemployment in San Marino.

Article 8. The Committee invites the Government to provide methodological information on the concepts and definitions relating to the register-based labour force statistics in pursuance of Article 6 of this Convention be provided to the ILO.

Article 9(1). Noting that the annual statistics of average earnings and hours actually worked are not yet broken down by sex, the Committee asks the Government to take necessary steps to this end and to keep the ILO informed of any future developments in this field.

Article 9(2). The Committee asks the Government to ensure that statistics covered by these provisions are regularly transmitted to the ILO.

Article 10. The Committee asks the Government to take necessary steps to give effect to this provision and to keep the ILO informed of any developments in this field.

Article 11. The Committee asks the Government to provide information on the application of the latest international standards and to specify, for each Article of the Convention for which the obligations were accepted (that is, Articles 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14 and 15), which standards and guidelines are followed.

The Committee also asks the Government to indicate the measures taken to produce, publish and communicate to the ILO specific methodological information on the concepts, definitions and methods adopted to compile statistics of average compensation of employees in pursuance of Article 6.

Article 12. The Committee invites the Government to provide the methodological information on the new consumer price indices (CPI) (base December 2002 = 100) in pursuance of Article 6 of this Convention.

Article 13. The Committee notes that detailed statistics on household expenditures are regularly published by the Office of Economic Planning, Data Processing and Statistics in the annual publication, Survey on the consumption and the San Marino families’ life style. However, no information is available in this publication about the sources, concepts, definition and methodology used in collecting and compiling household income and expenditure statistics. The Committee invites the Government to:

(i) indicate whether the representative organizations of employers and workers that were consulted when the concepts, definitions and methodology used were designed (in accordance with Article 3); and
The Committee recalls its comments under the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) published in 2017, in which it noted the observations of the Committee on the Application of Standards (CAS) of the International Labour Conference at its 100th Session (June 2011) on the application of this Convention and the effective functioning of the labour inspection system, including with regard to the protection of foreign workers. In this respect, the Committee previously noted the findings in an ILO assessment undertaken in December 2011, according to which most labour inspection visits were targeted at verifying the legality of the employment status of foreign workers. The Committee notes that the Government refers in its report, in response to the Committee’s request, to a regularization campaign concerning undocumented foreign workers who have been in the country since 2013, which enabled these workers to regulate their residence situation without being penalized under immigration law. It further notes that during the period of the regularization campaign, the enforcement of expulsion orders did not involve any costs for the foreign workers concerned (i.e. penalties for violations of immigration law or residence and work permit fees). Concerning the sanctioning of workers detected for working without a valid work permit, the Committee observed in its 2017 General Survey on certain occupational safety and health instruments, paragraph 452, that workers in a vulnerable situation may not be willing to cooperate with the labour inspection services if they fear negative consequences as a result of inspection activities, such as the loss of their job or expulsion from the country. Recalling that under the Convention, the primary duty of labour inspectors is to protect workers and not to enforce immigration law, the Committee once again requests the Government to provide information on the labour standards violations found in relation to foreign workers who are in an irregular situation, and any penalties imposed, classified according to the legal provisions to which they relate. Since the Government has not provided a reply in response to this request, the Committee also once again requests the Government to provide detailed information on the time and resources of the labour inspectorate spent on activities in the area of verifying the legality of employment compared to activities spent on securing the enforcement of legal provisions relating to conditions of work and the protection of workers (relating to working hours, wages, safety and health, child labour, forced labour, etc.).

Protection of the rights of foreign workers, including in relation to the payment of wages. The Committee recalls its comments under the Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) published in 2017, in which it noted the observations of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) concerning the widespread situation of wage arrears of foreign workers in the country, who often find themselves in a very difficult situation where their passport was confiscated. It also recalls its comments under the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) published in 2017, in which it noted that while the sponsorship system had been formally abolished, it appeared that this system was still applied in practice and that migrant workers suffering abuse and discriminatory treatment may still be reluctant to make complaints out of fear of retaliation by the employer or because of uncertainty as to whether this would lead, among other outcomes, to deportation. In reply to the Committee’s request made under the present Convention on the functioning of the wage protection system, the Government refers to the gradual implementation of the electronic wage protection monitoring system which aims at registering 3,489 enterprises and their mandatory use of this system. The Government also indicates that in 2015, violations of timely payment were established in relation to 4,493 workers employed by 365 undertakings, that 459 cases were referred to the judicial bodies and that 596 penalties were imposed in that year.

Finally, the Committee notes that the Government emphasizes, in response to its request, that the payment of outstanding entitlements, including wages and compensation for workplace injuries, of foreign workers who are in an irregular situation is guaranteed before their return to their country of origin. Welcoming the information on the guarantee of the payment of outstanding entitlements to foreign workers before the return to their country of origin, the Committee once again requests the Government to provide relevant statistics in this respect. Referring to its request made under Convention No. 29, the Committee requests the Government to indicate how labour inspectors assist foreign workers in the event of the violation of their rights, including with respect to matters related to abuse, discrimination, passport confiscation and contract substitution. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on any developments concerning the monitoring of wage arrears in the country, and to continue to provide statistical information on the number of violations detected and the penalties imposed in this respect.

Articles 10, 11 and 16. Number of labour inspectors and inspection visits. Material means available to the labour inspection services. The Committee recalls the commitment made by the Government during the discussions in the CAS in 2010 to create 1,000 additional labour inspection positions. It notes that the number of labour inspectors increased from 210 in 2010 to 606 in 2015 and that the number of labour inspection visits in the same period increased from 90,048 to

Article 3(1) and (2) of the Convention. Labour inspection functions concerning foreign workers. Immigration law. The Committee recalls the discussion in the Committee on the Application of Standards (CAS) of the International Labour Conference at its 100th Session (June 2011) on the application of this Convention and the effective functioning of the labour inspection system, including with regard to the protection of foreign workers. In this respect, the Committee previously noted the findings in an ILO assessment undertaken in December 2011, according to which most labour inspection visits were targeted at verifying the legality of the employment status of foreign workers. The Committee notes that the Government refers in its report, in response to the Committee’s request, to a regularization campaign concerning undocumented foreign workers who have been in the country since 2013, which enabled these workers to regulate their residence situation without being penalized under immigration law. It further notes that during the period of the regularization campaign, the enforcement of expulsion orders did not involve any costs for the foreign workers concerned (i.e. penalties for violations of immigration law or residence and work permit fees). Concerning the sanctioning of workers detected for working without a valid work permit, the Committee observed in its 2017 General Survey on certain occupational safety and health instruments, paragraph 452, that workers in a vulnerable situation may not be willing to cooperate with the labour inspection services if they fear negative consequences as a result of inspection activities, such as the loss of their job or expulsion from the country. Recalling that under the Convention, the primary duty of labour inspectors is to protect workers and not to enforce immigration law, the Committee once again requests the Government to provide information on the labour standards violations found in relation to foreign workers who are in an irregular situation, and any penalties imposed, classified according to the legal provisions to which they relate. Since the Government has not provided a reply in response to this request, the Committee also once again requests the Government to provide detailed information on the time and resources of the labour inspectorate spent on activities in the area of verifying the legality of employment compared to activities spent on securing the enforcement of legal provisions relating to conditions of work and the protection of workers (relating to working hours, wages, safety and health, child labour, forced labour, etc.).

Protection of the rights of foreign workers, including in relation to the payment of wages. The Committee recalls its comments under the Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) published in 2017, in which it noted the observations of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) concerning the widespread situation of wage arrears of foreign workers in the country, who often find themselves in a very difficult situation where their passport was confiscated. It also recalls its comments under the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) published in 2017, in which it noted that while the sponsorship system had been formally abolished, it appeared that this system was still applied in practice and that migrant workers suffering abuse and discriminatory treatment may still be reluctant to make complaints out of fear of retaliation by the employer or because of uncertainty as to whether this would lead, among other outcomes, to deportation. In reply to the Committee’s request made under the present Convention on the functioning of the wage protection system, the Government refers to the gradual implementation of the electronic wage protection monitoring system which aims at registering 3,489 enterprises and their mandatory use of this system. The Government also indicates that in 2015, violations of timely payment were established in relation to 4,493 workers employed by 365 undertakings, that 459 cases were referred to the judicial bodies and that 596 penalties were imposed in that year.

Finally, the Committee notes that the Government emphasizes, in response to its request, that the payment of outstanding entitlements, including wages and compensation for workplace injuries, of foreign workers who are in an irregular situation is guaranteed before their return to their country of origin. Welcoming the information on the guarantee of the payment of outstanding entitlements to foreign workers before the return to their country of origin, the Committee once again requests the Government to provide relevant statistics in this respect. Referring to its request made under Convention No. 29, the Committee requests the Government to indicate how labour inspectors assist foreign workers in the event of the violation of their rights, including with respect to matters related to abuse, discrimination, passport confiscation and contract substitution. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on any developments concerning the monitoring of wage arrears in the country, and to continue to provide statistical information on the number of violations detected and the penalties imposed in this respect.

Articles 10, 11 and 16. Number of labour inspectors and inspection visits. Material means available to the labour inspection services. The Committee recalls the commitment made by the Government during the discussions in the CAS in 2010 to create 1,000 additional labour inspection positions. It notes that the number of labour inspectors increased from 210 in 2010 to 606 in 2015 and that the number of labour inspection visits in the same period increased from 90,048 to 148,312. The Committee also notes that the 2015 labour inspection report identifies the insufficient number of labour inspectors in relation to the number of workplaces liable to inspection as a challenge. According to the statistical information in the 2017 annual labour inspection report, transmitted by the Government, there were 548 labour inspectors in 2017 and 76,107 labour inspections undertaken. Noting the decline in the number of labour inspectors, the Committee requests the Government to strengthen its efforts to ensure an adequate number of labour inspectors in relation to the workplaces liable to inspection, as called for under its commitment in the CAS, and to continue to provide information on the number of labour inspectors, including on the number of women inspectors working within the labour inspection services, as well as on the number of labour inspections undertaken. The Committee also requests the Government to provide information on the reasons for the decline in the number of inspections undertaken.

Articles 17 and 18. Enforcement of penalties. The Committee notes from the ILO assessment undertaken in 2011 that most infringement reports imposing penalties were rejected by the courts due to the existing system, which requires the signature of the concerned employers or their representatives. The Committee notes that the labour inspection reports sent by the Government contain statistics on the number of oral and written warnings and the number of infringement reports, but that they do not contain information on the nature of the infringements detected (such as working time, delays in the payment of wages, occupational safety and health, etc.) and the penalties imposed (such as the amount of fines). The Committee requests the Government to provide detailed information on the number of violations detected, the nature of the violations, and their outcome, including infringement reports issued, referrals to the judicial authorities, and the nature of the penalties imposed (fines or imprisonment). The Committee also requests information on any difficulties encountered in the enforcement of penalties for violations detected (such as the rejection of penalties by the courts due to procedural issues), and any measures taken to improve the system for the enforcement of labour law violations.

Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) (ratification: 1962)

Article 3(2) of the Convention. Additional functions entrusted to labour inspectors. The Committee notes from the 2015 Annual Report on labour statistics referred to in the Government’s report and available on the website of the Ministry of Labour, Social Dialogue, Professional Organizations and Institutional Relations that the labour inspection services dealt with a significant number of individual and collective labour disputes in that year. The Committee recalls that, in accordance with Article 3(2) of the Convention, any further duties which may be entrusted to labour inspectors shall not be such as to interfere with the effective discharge of their primary duties. In its General Survey of 2006, Labour inspection, the Committee recalled the importance of not overburdening inspectorates with tasks which by their nature may in certain countries be understood as incompatible with their primary function of enforcing legal provisions (paragraph 72). The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the time and resources devoted by labour inspectors to the additional functions of conciliation and mediation in comparison with their primary functions (as provided for in Article 3(1) of the Convention).

Articles 10, 11 and 16. Human and material resources of the inspection system and inspection visits. The Committee previously noted that in 2013, the labour inspection staff was composed of 60 inspectors and 59 controllers (assistant inspectors). The Committee notes in this respect that the Government reiterates that there is a need to increase the means of the labour inspection services, and that the strengthening of the financial and logistical means and human resources of the labour administration is one of the objectives in the National Pact for social stability and economic emergence signed with the social partners in 2014. The Committee also notes that according to the 2016 report on labour statistics (referred to in the Government’s report and available on the website of Ministry of Labour, Social Dialogue, Professional Organizations and Institutional Relations), the number of labour inspection staff had significantly decreased to 30 inspectors and 34 controllers by 2016. The Committee notes, however, that the recent reports on labour statistics indicate a significant rise in the number of workplaces inspected, rising from 1,587 in 2014, to 1,931 in 2015 and 2,607 in 2016. Noting the rise in the number of labour inspections but a decline in the number of labour inspectors, the Committee requests the Government to take measures to ensure that workplaces are inspected as thoroughly as is necessary to ensure the effective application of the relevant legal provisions and urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that there are a sufficient number of labour inspectors to secure the effective discharge of their duties. In this respect, it requests the Government to provide information on any improvements concerning the human resources and material means of the labour inspection services. It further requests the Government to provide information on the number of labour inspection staff and the financial and human resources available to the labour inspection services, as well as the number of labour inspections carried out from 2017 onwards.

Article 13(2)(b). Measures with immediate executory force in the event of imminent danger to the health or safety of the workers. The Committee previously noted that Decree No. 2006-1255 of 15 November 2006 limits the application of measures with immediate executory force in the event of imminent danger to the health or safety of the workers to situations resulting from a failure to comply with occupational safety and health laws or regulations (section 18) except in the building sector (where no violation of the legislation is required for an order of cessation of work (sections 19 and 20). The Committee notes the Government’s indication that these limitations are being considered in the context of the reflections concerning the strengthening of the legal powers of labour inspectors. With reference to its previous comments, the Committee once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures in law and practice to ensure that, in accordance with Article 13(2)(b), inspectors may order immediate executory measures in the event of imminent danger to the safety and health of the workers, without necessarily establishing the existence of a violation of laws or regulations in all industrial and commercial establishments, and not only in the building sector. The Committee also requests the Government to provide information on any measures taken or envisaged in the context of the consideration of the strengthening of the legal powers of labour inspectors.

Articles 17 and 18. Effective enforcement of adequate penalties for violations of legal provisions. The Committee notes the Government’s indications, in response to the Committee’s previous request, that there have not been any new developments concerning the proposed revision of the amounts of penalties for violations of the labour legislation. The Committee notes from the statistical information provided in the 2015 report on labour statistics that 1,931 labour inspection visits were undertaken in that year, and that labour inspectors requested employers to remedy violations detected, but that no reports of non-compliance were issued. It notes that this represents a significant decline from 2014, when 58 reports of non-compliance were issued, and it observes that only two reports of non-compliance were issued in 2016. The Government reiterates that a strengthening of the legal powers of labour inspectors is necessary and that the Minister of Labour had undertaken discussions with the Minister of Justice in that respect. The Committee requests the Government to provide detailed statistics on the violations detected during inspection visits and the subsequent penalties imposed, as well as to indicate the reasons for the significant decline in the number of non-compliance reports issued. The Committee also requests the Government to continue to provide information on any measures taken to strengthen the powers of labour inspectors. It once again requests the Government to provide information on any progress made in the revision of the amounts of penalties for labour law violations.

In order to provide a comprehensive view of the issues relating to the application of ratified Conventions on labour inspection, the Committee considers it appropriate to examine Conventions Nos 81 (labour inspection) and 129 (labour inspection in agriculture) together.

Article 12(1)(a) of Convention No. 81 and Article 16(1)(a) of Convention No. 129. Free entry of labour inspectors to workplaces without prior notice. The Committee notes with concern that the new Law on Inspection Oversight No. 36/15 of April 2015 applies to labour inspection and provides for a number of restrictions on the powers of inspectors. This includes with regard to the free initiative of labour inspectors to undertake inspections without prior notice provided for in Article 12(1)(a) of Convention No. 81 and Article 16(1)(a) of Convention No. 129: sections 16 and 17 of the Law, which require three days prior notice for most inspections and a written inspection warrant (except in emergency situations) specifying, among other things, the purpose of the inspection and its duration. Section 16 further provides that if, during the course of the inspection, an inspector uncovers an instance of non-compliance that exceeds the inspection warrant, the inspector must apply for an addendum to the warrant. The Committee also notes that the Law provides that inspectors shall be held personally accountable for the actions undertaken in the course of their duties (section 49) and that they may receive a fine in the amount of Serbian dinar (RSD) 50,000 to RSD150,000 (approximately US$500 to US$1,500), for example, if they undertake inspections without prior notice (section 60). The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the restrictions and limitations for labour inspectors in the Law on Inspection Oversight No. 36/15 are expeditiously removed so as to ensure that labour inspectors are empowered to enter freely and without prior notice workplaces liable to inspection in conformity with Article 12(1)(a) of Convention No. 81 and Article 16(1)(a) of Convention No. 129, and to inform the Committee of steps taken in this regard.

Articles 6 and 7 of the Convention. Recruitment and training of labour inspectors and independence of labour inspectors. The Committee notes the information in the Government’s report that no training opportunities have been provided to labour inspectors in terms of technical or specialized areas, although initial induction training is offered for labour inspectors within the various units in the Ministry of Labour and Social Security. The Committee also notes the Government’s indication that, with respect to qualifications of the labour inspection staff, one of the factors considered in recruitment is political affiliation. The Committee recalls that pursuant to Article 6 of the Convention, labour inspection staff shall be composed of public officials whose status and conditions of service are such that they are assured of stability of employment and are independent of improper external influences and, pursuant to Article 7, they shall be recruited with sole regard to their qualifications for the performance of their duties. The Committee requests the Government to take necessary measures to ensure that labour inspectors are recruited with sole regard to their qualifications for the performance of their duties, in accordance with Article 7 of the Convention. Taking due note of the resource constraints, the Committee expresses the hope that the Government will be in a position to make the necessary arrangements to implement an ongoing training programme for labour inspectors, and it requests the Government to provide information on any developments in this respect.

Article 12(1)(a). Unannounced visits and free access to workplaces liable to inspection. The Committee notes the Government’s indication in its report that owners of workplaces are notified of formal inspection visits. In this respect, the Committee recalls that under Article 12 of the Convention, labour inspectors provided with proper credentials shall be empowered to enter freely and without previous notice any workplace liable to inspection. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures, including in the context of the ongoing labour law reform process, to ensure that labour inspectors are empowered, in law and practice, to enter freely and without previous notice any workplace liable to inspection.

Article 18. Adequate penalties. The Committee notes the Government’s reference to the Factories Act, 1974 concerning applicable fines or penalties, and it observes in this respect that the fines established are quite low. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures in the context of the ongoing labour law reform, to ensure the establishment of adequate penalties for the legal provisions enforceable by labour inspectors.

Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) (ratification: 1965)

The Committee notes with concern that the Government’s report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments initially made in 2013.

Article 3(2) of the Convention. Additional functions entrusted to labour inspectors. The Committee notes that, according to the Government, labour inspections are carried out irrespective of nationality and that employers engaging workers covered under the Employment Act are required to discharge their obligations with regard to the statutory rights of foreign workers. The Government also indicates that foreign workers “who are not complicit” in their illegal employment may seek recourse for salary arrears and other benefits. The Committee reminds the Government that, in accordance with Article 3(2) of the Convention, any further duties which may be entrusted to labour inspectors shall not be such as to interfere with the effective discharge of their primary duties, or to prejudice in any way the authority and impartiality which are necessary to inspectors in their relations with employers and workers. Furthermore, the Committee refers to paragraphs 75–78 of its 2006 General Survey on labour inspection, in which it emphasized, in relation to the assignment to labour inspectors of the task of supervising the legality of employment and prosecuting violations, including migrant workers in an irregular situation, that the primary duty of labour inspectors is to secure the enforcement of the legal provisions relating to conditions of work and the protection of all workers and not to enforce immigration law, and that the Convention does not contain any provision suggesting that any worker be excluded from the protection afforded on account of their irregular employment status. The Committee reminds the Government that the function of verifying the legality of employment should have as its corollary the reinstatement of the statutory rights of all the workers if it is to be compatible with the objective of labour inspection, which is to protect the rights and interests of all workers and to improve their working conditions. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on how it ensures the discharge of employers’ obligations with regard to the statutory rights of foreign workers illegally employed, regardless of whether or not they are aware of their employment status, such as the payment of wages and any other benefits owed for the work performed in the framework of their employment relationship, including where the workers in question are liable to expulsion or after they have left the country.

Furthermore, the Committee asks the Government to provide information on the time and resources the labour inspectorate spends on activities in the area of irregular work in relation to activities spends on securing the enforcement of legal provisions relating to other areas (such as provisions relating to working hours, wages, safety and health, child labour, etc.), and to continue providing relevant information on the number of inspections, violations found and penalties imposed, categorized according to the legal provisions to which they relate.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government. The Committee expects that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

In order to provide a comprehensive view of the issues relating to the application of ratified Conventions on labour inspection, the Committee considers it appropriate to examine Conventions Nos 81 (labour inspection) and 129 (labour inspection in agriculture) together.
Article 3(2) of Convention No. 81, and Article 6(3) of Convention No. 129. Additional duties entrusted to labour inspectors. The Committee notes that according to the 2017 Report on the State of Work Protection, more time was spent by the labour inspection system performing inspections to control illegal employment than to perform inspections related to occupational safety and health (OSH). The Committee notes in this respect that the 2017 Report indicates that the labour inspection system cooperated with the specialized units of the Police Force (such as the Border and Alien Police Office; the Emergency Motor Vehicle Unit; Police and Criminal Police Officers; the Police Corps Presidium; the Risk Analysis and Coordination Division; the Risk Analysis and Statistics Department; the Human Trafficking Unit; the Centre for Combating Trafficking in Human Beings and Crime Prevention; the National Unit for Combating Illegal Migration; and the Local and National Police) to monitor compliance with the prohibition of illegal employment and trafficking of third-country nationals. The Committee also notes the information from the 2017 Report that in 2017 the labour inspection system carried out 19,467 inspections on illegal employment and 14,885 labour inspections on legal provisions under the Labour Code relating to wages, hours of work, employment contracts, as well as employment relationships.

The Committee recalls that, pursuant to Article 3(1) and (2) of Convention No. 81 and Article 6 of Convention No. 129, the functions of the system of labour inspection shall be to secure the enforcement of the legal provisions relating to conditions of work and the protection of workers while engaged in their work, and any further duties which may be entrusted to labour inspectors shall not be such as to interfere with the effective discharge of their primary duties. In its 2006 General Survey, Labour inspection, paragraph 78, the Committee indicated that any function of verifying the legality of employment should have as its corollary the reinstatement of the statutory rights of all the workers if it is to be compatible with the objective of labour inspection, which is to protect the rights and interests of all workers and to improve their working. Referring to paragraph 452 of the 2017 General Survey on certain occupational safety and health instruments, the Committee reminds the Government that workers in a vulnerable situation may not be willing to cooperate with the labour inspection services if they fear negative consequences as a result of inspection activities, such as the loss of their job or expulsion from the country. The Committee requests the Government to take specific measures to ensure that the functions assigned to labour inspectors do not interfere with the main objective of labour inspectors to ensure the protection of workers in accordance with labour inspectors’ primary duties as provided for in Article 3(2) of Convention No. 81 and Article 6(3) of Convention No. 129. It also once again requests the Government to provide information on action undertaken by the National Labour Inspectorate to ensure the enforcement of employers’ obligations with regard to the statutory rights of workers found to be in an irregular situation. It further asks the Government to provide information on the number of cases in which workers found to be in an irregular situation have been granted their due rights, such as the payment of outstanding wages or social security benefits.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Slovenia

Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) (ratification: 1992)

In order to provide a comprehensive view of the issues relating to the application of ratified Conventions on labour inspection, the Committee considers it appropriate to examine Conventions Nos 81 (labour inspection) and 129 (labour inspection in agriculture) together.

Legislation. The Committee previously noted the overlapping provisions of the Labour Inspection Act (LIA) and the Inspection Act (IA) (which applies to all supervisory bodies, not only the labour inspectorate). It noted that section 3 of the IA provides that in the event of conflicting provisions, other laws take precedence over the IA. It noted, however, that legal uncertainty remained with respect to a number of important issues covered by Convention No. 81, and requested the Government to provide information on steps taken to provide greater certainty regarding the applicable provisions concerning labour inspection. In this respect, the Committee notes a series of amendments to labour legislation in recent years that reshape the mandate and functions of the labour inspectorate, including further amendments to the LIA in 2017, the 2016 amendments to the Employment Relationship Act (ERA), as well as the adoption of the Employment, Self-employment and Work of Aliens Act (ESWLA) and the Prevention of Undeclared Work and Employment Act (PUWEA). It notes with concern that, despite legislative reforms in recent years, legal uncertainty remains due to conflicting or overlapping provisions of the LIA and IA, with respect to, among others, preventative measures by inspectors, qualifications for inspectors, the requirement for liable employers to cover the costs of inspection, inspectors’ free access to workplaces without prior notice with certain exceptions, inspection procedures and their costs. The Committee further notes that the labour inspectorate (LI) is proposing various amendments to the new LIA, described in detail in the annual labour inspection report for 2017 (2017 Annual Report) available on the LI’s website, some of which were transmitted to the Ministry of Labour, Family, Social Affairs and Equal Opportunities at the end of 2017. The Committee requests the Government to indicate the extent to which labour inspectors are bound by the general principles established under the IA as well as how the overlapping or conflicting provisions under the IA and the LIA are applied in practice to the daily work of labour inspectors. In this respect, it requests the Government to clearly identify the provisions of the IA... from which labour inspection is excluded, in light of the exception stated in section 3 of the IA, and to provide any judicial decisions or official guidance issued in that respect.

Articles 6, 10 and 16 of Convention No. 81 and Articles 8, 14, and 21 of Convention No. 129. Number of labour inspectors and their conditions of service. Stability and independence of labour inspectors. The Committee previously noted a decline in the number of labour inspectors (from 88 in 2011 to 81 in 2013). It notes with concern, that according to the 2017 Annual Report, the number has continued to drop to 77 in 2017 (41 labour inspectors for general labour conditions and employment relationships, 31 for occupational safety and health and five for social protection and security). The 2017 Annual Report states that this occurred despite an increase of 40,000 registered business entities since 2008 and additional duties being mandated to labour inspectors under the new LIA. In 2017, labour inspectors performed a total of 14,541 inspections (7,649 in the area of labour conditions and employment relationships; 6,659 on occupational safety and health and 233 on social protection), which resulted in the detection of a total of 29,513 violations. The Committee further notes with concern that the 2017 Annual Report states that labour inspectors are overwhelmed with the amount of assigned cases, and face a significant level of external pressure from both complainants and employers in the form of insults, misconduct, and aggressiveness concerning matters beyond their mandate. Noting the continuous decline in the number of labour inspectors and their heavy workload, as documented in the 2017 Annual Report, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the number of labour inspectors is sufficient to secure the effective discharge of the duties of the inspectorate. It requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken in this respect, as well as measures taken or envisaged to address the issues raised in the 2017 Annual Report related to the pressure facing labour inspectors, including with a view to ensuring their independence from improper external influences.

Sudan

Draft strategy on labour inspection. The Committee previously requested information on the status of the draft strategy on labour inspection, that was developed based on discussions in 2014 in the National Tripartite Workshop on Labour Inspection. The Committee takes note of the Government’s indication that the draft strategy on labour inspection has been transmitted to the joint committees with the social partners for their recommendations. It however notes with concern the delay in adopting the strategy which aims to enable the establishment and effective operation of the labour inspection system. Noting the transmission of the draft labour inspection strategy for consultation with the social partners, the Committee urges the Government to pursue its efforts with a view to adopting its strategy on labour inspection in the very near future, and to provide a copy once adopted.

Article 3(1) and (2) of the Convention. Labour inspection functions and additional duties entrusted to labour inspectors. The Committee takes note of the statistics provided in the Government’s report, in reply to its previous comments, indicating that in 2016, the labour inspectorate handled a total of 1,744 collective and individual labour disputes but performed only 226 labour and OSH inspections. The Committee notes with concern that this is a reduction of more than 80 per cent from the previous year (1,356 inspections were performed in 2015). The labour inspectorate also provided 564 consultations in 2016, a smaller reduction from the 609 consultations in 2015. Labour inspectors also engage in conflict resolution during inspections. In addition, the Government’s report indicates that labour inspection visits may involve inquiries regarding the reduction of employees for economic or technical reasons at an employer’s request and, where necessary, inquiries about termination of employment, in accordance with the law. In 2016, 44 inspection visits were performed for this purpose. Moreover, according to the Government’s report, inspection visits may also be conducted with the purpose of helping the public authorities implement an order relating to the public interest based on a directive from the competent authority. The Committee recalls that the primary functions of the labour inspection system are to secure the enforcement of the legal provisions relating to conditions of work and the protection of workers while engaged in their work. The Committee notes with concern that a significant part of labour inspectors’ activities is devoted to the resolution of labour disputes, despite the Government’s indication that a lack of resources hinders the practical application of labour legislation. Noting the limited available resources and the significant amount of time spent on the settlement of disputes, the Committee urges the Government to take the necessary steps to ensure that any other functions entrusted to inspection officers do not interfere with the effective discharge of their primary duties to enforce the legal provisions relating to conditions of work and the protection of workers while engaged in their work. The Committee also requests the Government to provide specific information on the role that the labour inspectorate plays in the reduction of workforce and termination of employment as well as information on orders previously issued relating to the public interest that required the undertaking of inspection visits. In addition, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on measures undertaken and contemplated to address the 80 per cent reduction in the number of labour inspections.

Article 4(1) and (2). Organization and effective functioning of the labour inspection system under the supervision and control of a central authority. The Committee notes the information provided by the Government, in response to its previous request for an organizational chart of the Labour Inspection (LI) and Industrial Relations (IR) Department, concerning the organization of the LI and IR Departments in Khartoum State. It notes, however, an absence of information on the organization of the central labour inspection system, or of other regional offices. It recalls that Article 4 of the Convention provides for the placing of the labour inspection system under the supervision and control of a central authority. It also once again requests the Government to provide information on the organization and functioning of the Labour Inspection and Industrial Relations Department, including its organizational chart, as well as an up-to-date list of inspection structures at labour offices in each of the states.

Articles 20 and 21. Publication and communication to the ILO of an annual report. The Committee notes with concern that no annual inspection reports have been prepared or communicated to the ILO for more than 25 years. However, it welcomes the information provided by the Government in its report concerning the number of labour inspection and occupational safety and health visits undertaken. It notes the Government’s statement that steps were taken towards the preparation of annual reports, including the identification of training needs and initiatives to facilitate the preparation of periodic reports by state labour offices. The Committee urges the Government to take all possible measures to ensure that annual labour inspection reports are prepared, published and transmitted to the ILO, in accordance with Articles 20 and 21 of the Convention.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Articles 3, 4, 5(b), 6, 8, 10, 11, 13, 17 and 18 of the Convention. Operation of the labour inspection system under the supervision and control of a central authority and duality of inspection functions assumed by state and trade union labour inspectors in this system. The Committee previously noted that responsibility for labour inspection falls within the State Inspection Service for Labour, Migration and Employment (SILME) of the Ministry of Labour, Migration and Employment, and the inspectorate established by the Federation of Independent Trade Unions (in view of the small number of the staff working at the SILME). The Committee notes the Government’s indication, in response to its request, that at the end of 2016, there were 58 public labour inspectors and 36 trade union inspectors. In this respect, the Committee also notes from section 353 of the Labour Code that employers provide funds for the work of the trade union labour inspectorate. The Committee once again requests the Government to provide information on whether the SILME maintains supervision and control over the labour inspection system in its entirety (including supervision of the activities of trade union inspectors), or whether the SILME and the inspectorate run by the Federation of Independent Trade Unions act independently from each other, except for the conduct of joint inspections. Noting that the Government has not provided information in this regard, the Committee also once again requests it to specify the status and conditions of service of labour inspectors serving in the SILME, in relation to the conditions applicable to similar categories of public servants and trade union inspectors (including concerning stability of employment, wages and allowances). Finally, the Committee requests the Government to indicate whether the trade union inspectorate of the Federation of Independent Trade Unions operates entirely on the budget from contributions of employers, and if not, to indicate the other sources of funding of its operation and their proportionate amounts.

Articles 12 and 16. Powers of labour inspectors. The Committee notes that sections 357 and 358 of the Labour Code provide for certain powers of trade union and public labour inspectors, for instance the power to undertake labour inspections and request information on compliance with the legal provisions. It further notes that sections 19 and 348 of the Labour Code require employers to ensure free access of public labour inspectors to workplaces. The Committee notes, however, with deep concern that pursuant to Law No. 1505 of 21 February 2018 providing for a moratorium on inspections in industrial workplaces, the provisions in the Code regarding labour inspections are suspended during the period of application of Law No. 1505, which according to information on the website of the President of the country will be effective for a two-year period, following the issuing of a Governmental Decree. The Committee also notes with concern that the Law on Inspections of Economic Entities, adopted by Government Decision No. 518 of 2007, which applies to the labour inspectorate (among other inspection bodies) and to all sectors (not only industry), provides for a number of limitations on inspections. The Committee further notes with concern that the Law includes restrictions with regard to the frequency and duration of labour inspections (for example, section 10 of the Law provides that an inspection body may not inspect an economic entity more than once every two years, or exceptionally for a high risk entity, not more than once every six months, and that new entities cannot be inspected until the end of their third year of registration), the need to give prior notice (for example, sections 11 and 13 of the Law provide that economic entities shall be notified three days before the initiation of inspections, except in emergency situations or aggravated sanitary situations (section 15)), and the limitations of the scope of inspections, particularly in terms of the issues to be inspected (section 13). The Committee emphasizes that any moratorium placed on labour inspection is a serious violation of the Convention, and urges the Government to ensure that the necessary legislative measures are taken with a view to ending the moratorium on labour inspections in the industrial sector. The Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that labour inspectors are empowered to make visits without previous notice, and that they are able to undertake labour inspections as often and as thoroughly as is necessary to ensure the effective application of the legal provisions, in conformity with Articles 12 and 16 of the Convention.

In order to provide a comprehensive view of the issues relating to the application of ratified Conventions on labour inspection, the Committee considers it appropriate to examine Conventions Nos 81 (labour inspection) and 129 (labour inspection in agriculture) together.

Article 3(1)(a) and (2) of Convention No. 81 and Article 6(1) and (3) of Convention No. 129. Labour inspection activities with regard to foreign workers and the protection of foreign workers in an irregular situation. The Committee notes the Government’s indication, in reply to its previous comments, that labour inspectors carry out the supervision of the implementation of the Law on Employment of Foreign Nationals (LEFN) during regular inspections in the areas of labour relations. The Committee notes that, pursuant to section 18(2) of the Law, the monitoring of its implementation shall be carried out by the State Labour Inspectorate (SLI) and pursuant to section 18(3), labour inspections related to work permits and illegal employment or work of foreign nationals may be carried out ex officio or at the request of the Employment Service Agency (ESA). The SLI is then obliged to submit reports every six months regarding the instituted procedures and imposed misdemeanour sanctions to the ESA pursuant to section 18(4) of the LEFN. Fines can be imposed not only on an employer or a facilitator of illegal work, but also on a foreign national if she or he does not present the work permit when requested by the SLI (section 27). The Committee recalls that, pursuant to Article 3 of Convention No. 81 and Article 6 of Convention No. 129, the functions of the system of labour inspection shall be to secure the enforcement of the legal provisions relating to conditions of work and the protection of workers while engaged in their work. Further, in its 2006 General Survey, Labour inspection, paragraph 78, the Committee indicated that any function of verifying the legality of employment should have as its corollary the reinstatement of the statutory rights of all the workers if it is to be compatible with the objective of labour inspection, which is to protect the rights and interests of all workers and to improve their working conditions. Referring to paragraph 452 of the 2017 General Survey on certain occupational safety and health instruments, the Committee recalls that workers in a vulnerable situation may not be willing to cooperate with the labour inspection services if they fear negative consequences as a result of inspection activities, such as the loss of their job or expulsion from the country. The Committee requests the Government to take specific measures to ensure that the functions assigned to labour inspectors do not interfere with the main objective of labour inspectors, which is to ensure the protection of workers in accordance with Article 3(2) of Convention No. 81 and Article 6(3) of Convention No. 129. It requests the Government to provide information on action undertaken by the inspectorate to ensure the enforcement of the rights of foreign workers found to be in an irregular situation. It further asks the Government to provide information on the number of cases in which foreign workers found to be in an irregular situation have been granted their due rights, such as the payment of outstanding wages or social security benefits.

Article 4 of the Convention. Supervision and control by a central authority. In its previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government to pursue its efforts in placing again the labour inspection system under the supervision and control of a central authority, following its decentralization in 1995. In this respect, the Committee recalls the reiterated discussion of the case by the Committee on the Application of Standards (CAS) of the International Labour Conference (in 2001, 2003 and 2008) and the conclusions of the CAS emphasizing the need for the inspection system to be under the responsibility of a central authority. The Committee notes the Government’s indication in its report that the Ministry of Gender, Labour and Social Development (MGLSD) plays a supervisory role, although the system of labour inspection is decentralized. The Government indicates that the MGLSD has started a process to amend the legislation and to place the inspection system under a central authority. The Committee urges the Government to pursue its efforts to place the labour inspection system under a central authority with a view to ensuring coherence in the functioning of the labour inspection system and to provide information on the steps taken in that regard, including a copy of any legislation adopted.

Articles 10, 11 and 16. Resources of the labour inspection system and inspection visits. In its previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government to pursue its efforts to ensure that human and financial resources are allocated to labour inspection. The Committee notes that the Government indicates that the MGLSD has continued to ensure that human and material resources are allocated to labour inspection and that additional vehicles have been provided to the Department of Labour. However, the Committee notes the Government’s indication that inadequate funding continues to represent a challenge. In addition, the Committee notes the 2016 report on the audit undertaken by the auditor general of the Department of Occupational Safety and Health (OSH) of the MGLSD on OSH enforcement activities. The report finds that: (a) out of an estimated 1 million workplaces in the country, only 476 were inspected between 2013 and 2015 (212 in 2012–13, 125 in 2013–14, and 139 in 2014–15, based on departmental annual performance reports); (b) the MGLSD procured analytical and clinical laboratory equipment, but the OSH Department has not fully trained inspectors on the use of the equipment; and (c) enforcement of the OSH legislation has not been effective due to limited personnel and logistics. With respect to personnel issues, the Committee notes that the report indicates that out of 48 approved staff positions, only 22 are currently filled. The Committee notes with concern the limited human and material resources allocated to labour inspection and urges the Government to take steps to ensure that there are a sufficient number of labour inspectors provided with adequate resources, including through the filling of vacant positions, in conformity with Articles 10 and 11 of the Convention, in order to ensure that workplaces are inspected as often as is necessary for the effective application of the relevant legal provisions, as required by Article 16 of the Convention.

Articles 20 and 21. Publication and communication of an annual report on labour inspection. In its previous comments, the Committee had noted the Government’s commitment to publish and submit to the ILO an annual inspection report on the work of the labour inspection services, pursuant to section 20 of the Employment Act 2006. The Committee notes the Government’s indication that a draft annual report has been compiled. However, it notes with concern that no report has been published or submitted to the ILO. The Committee once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that annual reports on labour inspection are published and communicated regularly to the ILO within the time limits set out in Article 20 and that they contain the information required by Article 21(a)–(g).

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Ukraine

Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) (ratification: 2004)

The Committee notes the Government’s report received by the Office on 14 August 2018, as well as the supplementary information received from the Government on 27 November 2018. The latter communication will be examined by the Committee at its next session as it was received too late to be examined at its current session.

In order to provide a comprehensive view of the issues relating to the application of the ratified Conventions on labour inspection, the Committee considers it appropriate to examine Conventions Nos 81 (labour inspection) and 129 (labour inspection in agriculture) together.

Follow-up to the conclusions of the Committee on the Application of Standards (International Labour Conference, 107th Session, May–June 2018)

The Committee notes the 2018 conclusions of the Committee on the Application of Standards (CAS) on the application of Conventions Nos 81 and 129 by Ukraine, which called on the Government to: (i) take the necessary measures and appropriate reforms to bring their labour inspection services into line with the provisions of Conventions Nos 81 and 129; (ii) provide detailed information regarding the restrictions on the powers of labour inspectors contained in Act No. 877 and Ministerial Decree No. 295 and regarding the recent legislation enacted on the labour inspection system; (iii) promote effective dialogue with employers’ and workers’ organizations concerning labour inspection matters; (iv) ensure that the status and conditions of service of labour inspectors guarantee their independence, transparency, impartiality and accountability in line with the Conventions; (v) ensure that the inspection functions of the local authorities are placed under the supervision and control of the State Labour Service (SLS); and (vi) ensure that other functions entrusted to labour inspectors do not interfere with their primary duties and impact negatively on the quality of labour inspections.
Articles 12(1)(a) and (b), 16 and 17 of Convention No. 81 and Articles 16(1)(a) and (b), 21 and 22 of Convention No. 129. Restrictions and limitations on labour inspection. 1. Moratorium on labour inspection. The Committee previously noted the imposition of a moratorium on labour inspection between January and June 2015. It notes once more with deep concern that another moratorium had been imposed on labour inspection between 1 January 2018 and 22 February 2018. Recalling that a moratorium placed on labour inspection is a serious violation of these Conventions, the Committee urges the Government to ensure that no further restrictions of this nature are placed on labour inspection in the future.

2. Other restrictions. In its previous comment, the Committee noted with concern that Act No. 877 (as amended in 2017) concerning the fundamental principles of state supervision and monitoring of economic activity, and Ministerial Decree No. 295 of 26 April 2017 on the procedure for state control and state supervision of compliance with labour legislation, provide for several restrictions on the powers of labour inspectors, including with regard to the free initiative of labour inspectors to undertake inspections without prior notice (section 5 of Decree No. 295 and section 5(4) of Act No. 877), the frequency of labour inspections (section 5(1) of Act No. 877), and the discretionary powers of labour inspectors to initiate prompt legal proceedings without previous warning (sections 27 and 28 of Decree No. 295). It urged the Government to take the necessary measures to bring the legislation into conformity with the Convention.

The Committee notes with regret that the Government has not provided any response to the request of the Committee on the measures taken to bring Act No. 877 and Ministerial Decree No. 295 into conformity with Articles 12(1)(a) and (b), 16 and 17 of Convention No. 81 and Articles 16(1)(a) and (b), 21 and 22 of Convention No. 129. The Committee also notes that the Government has not provided any further information on Bill No. 6489 (on amendments to certain laws concerning the prevention of excessive pressure on businesses due to state supervision of compliance with labour and employment legislation) which passed the first reading in Parliament in July 2017 and which makes the conduct of unscheduled inspection visits an administrative offence. The Committee urges the Government, in line with the 2018 conclusions of the CAS, to take the necessary measures and appropriate reforms to bring the labour inspection services into line with the provisions of Conventions Nos 81 and 129. In this respect, the Committee once again urges the Government to take the necessary measures to bring Act No. 877 and Ministerial Decree No. 295 into conformity with Articles 12(1)(a) and (b), 16 and 17 of Convention No. 81 and Articles 16(1)(a) and (b), 21 and 22 of Convention No. 129, and to ensure that no additional restrictions are adopted.

Articles 4, 6, 7 and 11 of Convention No. 81 and Articles 7, 8, 9 and 15 of Convention No. 129. Organization of the labour inspection system under the supervision and control of a central authority. Partial decentralization of labour inspection functions. The Committee previously noted that pursuant to Decree No. 295 of 27 April 2017, applying section 259 of the Labour Code and section 34 of the Local Government Act, labour inspection functions were also assumed by the local authorities, in addition to the SLS. In this respect, the Committee recalled the importance of ensuring that organizational changes are carried out in conformity with the provisions of the Conventions.

The Committee notes the Government’s reiterated indication, in response to the Committee’s previous request concerning the placing of the labour inspection system under the supervision and control of a central authority, that efforts are being made to avoid duplication, including through: (i) the establishment of a joint register on the inspections undertaken by the SLS and the local authorities, implemented through an electronic system; (ii) the certification of “authorized officials” by the SLS (which the Government indicates are now 399 persons) and the possibility of the SLS to revoke their credentials if they systematically fail to duly exercise their monitoring powers; and (iii) the possibility by the SLS to repeal any instructions or orders by the local government bodies within ten days. The Government further indicates that “authorized officials” within the local government bodies have the free initiative to undertake labour inspections at any time of the day or night, without prior notice.

The Committee also notes that the Government reiterates that the local government authorities receive guidance, information and training from the SLS. It refers in this respect to several activities, including approximately 3,310 seminars, meetings and round tables on how to undertake inspections, 5,861 letters sent about the exercise of inspection powers, the provision of distance learning courses, and six joint trainings with the participation of 234 persons appointed to undertake inspections by the local bodies. The Committee notes that the Government has not provided the information requested on the status and conditions of service of the “authorized officials”. The Committee requests the Government, in line with the 2018 conclusions of the CAS, to ensure that the inspection functions of the local authorities are placed under the supervision and control of the SLS. Because the Government has not provided a reply in this regard, the Committee once again requests the Government to indicate how it is ensured that the “authorized officials” from the local authorities performing labour inspection functions have the status and conditions of service guaranteeing their independence from any undue external influence (Article 6 of Convention No. 81 and Article 8 of Convention No. 129). In this regard, it requests the Government to indicate the legal provisions governing the conditions of service of these officials. It also requests the Government to provide more detailed information on how it is ensured that “authorized officials” working as labour inspectors have the adequate qualifications and training for the effective performance of inspection duties (Article 7 of Convention No. 81 and Article 9 of Convention No. 129). In this respect, it requests the Government to provide information on the recruitment procedures of these officials, including the qualifications required and if they include regular competitions as for SLS inspectors.
Material means and human resources to achieve an adequate coverage of workplaces by labour inspection. The Committee previously noted from the 2015 needs assessment undertaken by the ILO that increasing the number of labour inspectors and material resources (including transport facilities, registers and appropriate software) was essential for enhancing the number and quality of inspections. The Committee welcomes the Government’s indication in its report that in July 2018 there were 615 labour inspectors (up from 542 inspectors noted in 2017) and 904 established posts (up from 765). The Government also refers to regular recruitment competitions to fill vacant positions. The Committee further notes the Government’s indication, in response to the Committee’s request, that 585.2 million Ukrainian hryvnia (approximately US$671.7 million) were allocated for labour inspection in the 2018 State Budget Act, but that this Act was not implemented. Noting that almost one third of the posts remain unfilled, the Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on the filling of the vacant posts, with a view to ensuring that the number of inspectors is sufficient for the effective performance of their duties. The Committee also requests the Government to continue to provide information on the measures taken to improve the budgetary situation of the SLS, including the material means at its central and local levels. In addition, the Committee once again requests the Government to provide information on the material resources (offices, office equipment and supplies, transport facilities and reimbursement of travel expenses), at the central and local levels of the SLS.

Additional functions entrusted to labour inspectors. The Committee notes that the Government has not responded to the conclusions of the CAS that the Government ensure that other functions entrusted to labour inspectors do not interfere with their primary duties. The Committee urges the Government to list any other functions entrusted to SLS inspectors or “authorized officials” from the local authorities, and to explain how those functions are constrained from interfering with inspectors’ discharge of their duties to secure the enforcement of labour laws and the protection of workers.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Direct requests

In addition, requests regarding certain matters are being addressed directly to the following States: Convention No. 63 (Myanmar); Convention No. 81 (Albania, Angola, Antigua and Barbuda, Australia, Bahamas, Bangladesh, Barbados, Plurinational State of Bolivia, Central African Republic, Chad, Croatia, Djibouti, France: French Polynesia, Ghana, Grenada, Guinea-Bissau, Hungary, India, Indonesia, Jamaica, Kyrgyzstan, Luxembourg, Malawi, New Zealand, Nigeria, Norway, Pakistan, Poland, Qatar, Romania, Russian Federation, Saint Vincent and the Grenadines, Saudi Arabia, Senegal, Serbia, Seychelles, Sierra Leone, Singapore, Slovakia, Slovenia, Sudan, Suriname, Switzerland, Tajikistan, United Republic of Tanzania: Tanganyika, The former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, Trinidad and Tobago, Uganda, Ukraine, Uruguay); Convention No. 129 (Albania, Plurinational State of Bolivia, Croatia, France: French Polynesia, Hungary, Luxembourg, Norway, Poland, Romania, Saint Vincent and the Grenadines, Serbia, Slovakia, Slovenia, The former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, Ukraine, Uruguay); Convention No. 150 (Belize, Democratic Republic of the Congo, Dominica, Kyrgyzstan, Malawi, Niger, Russian Federation, Serbia, Suriname, The former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, Trinidad and Tobago); Convention No. 160 (Kyrgyzstan).

The Committee noted the information supplied by the following State in answer to a direct request with regard to: Convention No. 150 (Luxembourg).
Employment policy and promotion

Albania

Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122) (ratification: 2009)

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Implementation of an active employment policy. Employment trends. The Committee notes with interest the sustained efforts made by the Government to improve the employability of the labour force, reduce poverty and improve the technical vocational education and training system, placing a focus on young persons and specific groups vulnerable to decent work deficits. In this context, the Committee notes the information provided by the Government on the reorganization of the National Employment Service (NES), enhancing its administrative and training capacities. The NES reform focused on the implementation and evaluation of active labour market policies (ALMPs). As a result, employment offices have introduced a new service model concentrated on the reorganization of working environments, the introduction of jobseekers and employers, offering services in conformity with the European Union Public Employment Services Standards, reviewing existing ALMPs and adapting the respective regulatory framework. The NES reform has led to a transformation of the public employment offices, entailing the modernization of the infrastructure as well as the reconceptualization and computerization of services. The Committee further notes that the reform envisages the reduction of gender skills gaps to increase women’s employability, as well as to address the needs of specific groups, such as the Roma and other ethnic minorities, persons with disabilities and persons residing in rural or remote areas, to ensure their inclusion in the labour market. In addition, 21 new employment offices have been established at the regional and local levels. The Committee also notes that the National Employment and Skills Strategy 2014-2020 and its Action Plan, developed with ILO assistance, aims to provide a comprehensive policy framework for better jobs and increased skills. According to the 2017–21 Decent Work Country Programme (DWCP) for Albania, the country’s economic development over the past decade has been accompanied by positive changes in general employment and the reduction of poverty rates. The Committee notes that, while this growth was reflected in reduced rates of unemployment in general, according to the DWCP, the growth in the Albanian economy did not always lead to the creation of more jobs, particularly for women and young persons. High youth unemployment rates remain a concern for the Government, particularly given that close to 42 per cent of the population is under the age of 30. The Committee notes in this regard that, in the first quarter of 2018, the unemployment rate of persons aged 15–29 (24.5 per cent) was nearly twice as high as the general unemployment rate of persons aged 15 and above (12.5 per cent). The unemployment rate has decreased for both age groups since the first quarter of 2016, from 30.4 per cent for young persons aged 15 to 29 and 16.6 per cent for those aged 15 and over. During the same period, the employment rate increased from 47.5 per cent to 51.9 per cent for persons above the age of 15 and from 32.1 per cent to 35.9 per cent for those aged 15 to 29. In the first quarter of 2018, labour force participation rates stood at 59.3 per cent (67.4 per cent for men and 51.3 per cent for women) for those aged 15 and above and at 47.5 per cent for persons between 15 and 29 (54.9 per cent for men and 39.7 per cent for women). The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on progress made with respect to the formulation and adoption of an active employment policy, in consultation with the social partners, as well as on the impact of active labour market measures implemented to promote full, productive and freely chosen employment. It further requests the Government to supply updated information in its next report on employment trends, including on employment, unemployment and underemployment; also statistical information disaggregated by sector, age and sex. Furthermore, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on measures taken to improve the employment situation of groups vulnerable to decent work deficits, including women, young persons, persons with disabilities, rural workers, workers belonging to the Roma and other ethnic minorities, and those in the informal economy. The Committee further requests the Government to provide information on measures taken or contemplated to improve job creation and increase labour market participation, particularly for young persons.

Vocational education and training. The Committee notes that, according to the DWCP, NES surveys carried out in Albania in 2008, 2010 and 2012 found that there were skills gaps in all sectors of the economy. Moreover, Technical Vocational Education and Training (TVET) is offered in 53 existing schools, which are almost all located in urban areas. The Committee notes the adoption of Law No. 15/2017 on Vocational Education and Training of 16 February 2017, which seeks to enhance skills development to address the skills gap. It also notes the adoption of Decision No. 64 on the Employment Promotion Program of Young People who gained the Status of Orphans, of 27 January 2016, as well as the support received during 2010–17 from the German Federal Ministry for Economic Cooperation as part of the “Vocational education and training (VET) programme”. The Committee also notes the information provided concerning the current United Nations Development Programme project, implemented in cooperation with the Ministry of Social Welfare and Youth, which aims to improve youth employment opportunities in the Lezha, Kukës, and Shkodra regions, all of which have high unemployment rates. In particular, the Committee welcomes the project’s focus on young persons with disabilities, with the objective of creating employment opportunities to promote their sustainable inclusion in the labour market. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on the impact of the measures taken in the area of TVET and on their relation to prospective employment opportunities. It also requests the Government to indicate the manner in which the social partners and other stakeholders concerned are consulted with respect to the development of TVET programmes.
Article 3. Consultation with the social partners. The Committee notes that the Government has not provided information on this point. It therefore reiterates its request that the Government provide information on the activities of the Tripartite Administrative Council and National Labour Council with respect to the formulation and implementation of active labour market measures. It also requests the Government to indicate the nature and outcome of consultations held with representatives of persons affected by the measures taken or envisaged.

Algeria

The Committee notes that the Government’s report does not contain a response to the observations made on 31 May 2015 by the General and Autonomous Confederation of Workers in Algeria (CGATA) regarding the provisions of the draft Labour Code, referred to in the Committee’s previous comments. The Committee reiterates its request that the Government provide its comments in this respect.

Articles 1(1)(a) and (b), 2(4) and 3 of the Convention. Private employment agencies. Exclusions. Conditions governing the operation of private employment agencies. The Government reports that, as of May 2017, there were 29 certified private employment agencies (PEAs) operating in the country. The Committee notes the Government’s indication that, pursuant to the laws and regulations currently in force – Law No. 04-19 of 25 December 2004 on the Placement of Workers and Supervision of Work and Decree No. 07-123 of 24 April 2007 – PEAs are not authorized to mediate jobseekers abroad, to place foreign jobseekers in employment in Algeria, or to employ workers with a view to making them available to a third party. The Government states that, at present, PEAs are authorized only to provide services consisting of matching offers of and applications for employment, as contemplated in Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention. It notes that the draft Labour Code, on which the Government is consulting the social partners, will expand the scope of activities in which certified PEAs may engage, to include services to be offered by temporary work agencies (TWAs) in the sense of Article 1(1)(b) of the Convention, with a view to facilitating the employment of part-time and unemployed workers and enabling the user enterprise to meet temporary demands for labour. The Government adds that the draft Labour Code will also cover subcontracting activities with a view to combating informal work and illicit subcontracting activities. The Committee requests the Government to indicate whether private employment agencies operating in the country carry out placement activities. Noting that the Government has been pursuing the development of the draft Labour Code for a number of years, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on progress made in relation to the development and adoption of the draft Code, and to provide copies of the Code and its implementing regulation once adopted. In this regard, the Committee recalls that it may avail itself of technical assistance from the Office, should it so wish. The Committee further requests the Government to provide information on the provisions of the draft Labour Code mentioned in its report, concerning the certification of the activities of TWAs, the circumstances in which recourse may be made to their services, the status and rights of their employees, and the nature of the contract between the TWA and its employees.

Article 5(1). Non-discrimination. Referring to its previous comments, the Committee notes that the Government’s report does not contain information concerning concrete measures taken to ensure that PEAs do not subject workers to any of the types of discrimination covered by the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111). Recalling that it has been making comments for a number of years in relation to the need to take measures to ensure that PEAs do not engage in discrimination, the Committee reiterates its request that the Government provide detailed information on concrete measures taken to ensure that PEAs treat workers without discrimination on the basis of race, colour, sex, religion, political opinion, national extraction, social origin, or any other form of discrimination prohibited under national law and practice.

Article 5(2). Special services and targeted programmes to assist the most disadvantaged workers. The Committee notes the Government’s indication that the cooperation agreement of 25 January 2012 between the National Employment Agency (ANEM) and certified PEAs focuses particularly on the placement of young persons and the long-term unemployed. The agreement stipulates that ANEM will provide technical support to these PEAs in relation to job placement activities, as well as training in career counselling and statistics. The Committee once again requests the Government to provide information on the manner and extent to which PEAs are engaged in the practical implementation of special services or targeted programmes to assist the most disadvantaged workers in their job-seeking activities (Article 5(2)).

Article 8. Protection of workers in a cross-border context. The Committee notes the Government’s indication that PEAs are not authorized to place foreign workers in Algeria. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the measures adopted to provide adequate protection for and prevent abuses of migrant workers recruited or placed in its territory by PEAs, as well as on the penalties provided for under national laws or regulations in the event of fraud or abuse. The Government is further requested to provide information on consultations held with the representative organizations of employers and workers in this respect, as required by Article 8(1) of the Convention.

Article 9. Measures to prevent child labour. The Government reports that the draft Labour Code is expected to contain provisions prohibiting the use of child labour in TWAs and user enterprises. Recalling the comments it has been making for a number of years under the Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182), and the Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138), the Committee urges the Government to take measures to ensure without delay the adoption of protective measures ensuring that child labour is not used or supplied by PEAs.

Articles 10 and 14. Inspections and adequate complaint machineries and procedures. The Government reports that the labour inspection service and the employment administration are responsible for supervising the activities of PEAs, adding that the draft Labour Code, once adopted, will further strengthen controls and labour inspection capacity. Taking note of the types of abuses and fraudulent activities in which certain PEAs have engaged, as described in the Government’s report, the Committee reiterates its request that the Government provide information illustrating how the procedures currently in force ensure an effective examination of alleged abuses and fraudulent practices relating to the activities of PEAs, to indicate the nature and number of the complaints received, and the manner in which they have been resolved (Article 10). The Government is further requested to specify the remedies, including penalties, where appropriate, imposed in case of violations of the Convention (Article 14).

Articles 11 and 12. Ensuring adequate protection for workers. Allocation of responsibilities of PEAs and user enterprises. The Government indicates that the draft Labour Code, once adopted, will regulate the status and rights of employees of TWAs and establish the modalities of the contract between the TWAs and the user enterprise on the basis of which a worker may be made available to the user enterprise. The Committee requests the Government to indicate the manner in which the current legislation ensures adequate protection of the rights of workers employed by PEAs, in relation to all the rights set out in Article 11(a)–(j), of the Convention, as well as the manner in which it is envisaged that the draft Labour Code or other measures would ensure equivalent or increased protection. It requests the Government to indicate the measures taken to determine and allocate the responsibilities of TWAs and user enterprises in relation to each of the matters set out in Article 12(a)–(i).

Article 13. Effective cooperation between the public employment service and PEAs. In response to the Committee’s previous comments in relation to the cooperation agreement of 25 January 2012 between the ANEM and certified PEAs, the Government indicates that the nature of the information that PEAs must provide to ANEM and its frequency are regulated by executive decree. The Committee reiterates its request that the Government provide examples of the information submitted to the National Employment Agency by private employment agencies (Article 13(2)), as well as a copy of the abovementioned executive decree to the Office and that it specify the nature and frequency with which this information is made available to the public (Article 13(3)).

Armenia

Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122) (ratification: 1994)

The Committee notes the observations of the Republican Union of Employers of Armenia (REUA) and the Confederation of Trade Unions of Armenia (CTUA), received together with the Government’s report. The Government is requested to provide its comments in this respect.

Article 1 of the Convention. Employment trends and implementation of an active employment policy. The Government reports that, to reduce the risk of corruption, evaluate the level of satisfaction of beneficiaries and improve the effective implementation of programmes carried out under the 2013–2018 Employment Strategy, in 2016, the Government evaluated 14 programmes in different regions, soliciting the views of employers. In addition to shifting the exchange of information and the provision of assistance to electronic means, the evaluation also led to increased individualization of services to jobseekers. The Government reports that, at the end of 2016, there were 95,800 registered jobseekers (62,200 women and 22,300 young persons), out of which 85,500 persons (84 per cent) were unemployed. In 2016, 9,546 persons found employment – 6,912 of whom were not registered in government employment programmes – 66 per cent of these were women and 30.9 per cent were young persons. The Committee notes the presence of regional disparities in this regard, with the highest numbers reported for Yerevan (2,391 women and 716 young persons) and the lowest in Vayots Dzor (156 women and 109 young persons). In the same year, through assistance programmes directed at the rural economy in the form of seasonal employment and paid public works, 13,006 jobseekers (13.6 per cent) participated in active labour market measures of which 3,768 (74 per cent) were women and 1,878 (36.8 per cent) were young persons. The Committee requests the Government to provide detailed updated information, including statistical data disaggregated by year, sector, sex and age, on employment trends in the country, specifically on employment, unemployment and underemployment. It also asks the Government to provide information on the impact of the active labour market measures implemented in the different regions of the country.

Groups vulnerable to decent work deficits. In its observations, the trade union maintains that the Government’s efforts to reduce unemployment and poverty, as detailed in its report, are insufficient. It calls for projects to be implemented that target women, young persons and persons with disabilities. The Committee notes the detailed information provided by the Government in respect of the situation of women and young persons. The Government indicates that it is conscious of the high unemployment rate for women: 66 per cent. The unemployment rate for young persons was 23.7 per cent. In this regard, the Committee notes the diverse programme and initiatives primarily directed at young persons in urban as well as rural areas – in particular with regard to vocational guidance, which aims to raise awareness of labour market needs and improve employability. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the results of the measures and programmes implemented to promote the employment of groups vulnerable to decent work deficits, including women, young persons and persons with disabilities. In regard to active labour market measures directed at young persons, the Government is requested to provide information on the impact of the measures taken in the area of vocational education and training and on their relation to improving the employability of young persons.

Article 2. Implementation of active labour market measures. In response to the Committee’s previous comments, the Government indicates that, while obstacles remain in terms of improving cooperation between private employment agencies and the Armenian State Employment Agency, financial payments are made to private employment agencies that recruit persons who are difficult to place in the labour market. The Committee requests the Government to continue providing information on measures taken or envisaged to strengthen cooperation between the public employment services and private employment agencies. The Committee also requests the Government to provide information on the number of persons so recruited, the criteria used to identify persons who are difficult to place in the labour market, and the placement results obtained by private employment agencies.

Undeclared work. In response to the Committee’s previous comments, the Government reports that 2,241 undeclared workers were detected in 2017. The Government refers to the Tax Code of the Republic of Armenia, which entered into force on 1 January 2018, and provides for the electronic registration of all employees before they commence their employment. The Committee requests the Government to continue providing information on the measures taken or envisaged to reduce the number of undeclared workers and facilitate their integration into the formal economy.

Article 3. Consultation of the social partners. The Government indicates that, on the basis of the new collective contract, the Government and the social partners typically decide on and implement active labour market measures in the Republican Tripartite Committee, which meets at least on a quarterly basis. The Committee requests the Government to provide more detailed information on the activities of the Republican Tripartite Committee and other tripartite committees at the national and regional levels, with respect to the development and implementation of active labour market measures and programmes.

Bosnia and Herzegovina

Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122) (ratification: 1993)

The Committee notes the observations of the Confederation of Independent Trade Unions of Bosnia and Herzegovina (SSSBiH) and the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) received on 1 September 2017. The Committee requests the Government to provide its comments in this respect.

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Implementation of an active employment policy. In their observations, the workers’ organizations allege that the Government has failed to declare and pursue, as a major goal, an active policy designed to promote full, productive and freely chosen employment. They stress that the employment situation in both Federation of Bosnia and Herzegovina (FBiH) and Republika Srpska (RS) is dire, with extremely high rates of unemployment, citing a 28 per cent general unemployment rate and youth unemployment rates exceeding 60 per cent. The Committee notes the Government’s indication that, pursuant to the Law on Employment Intermediation and Social Security of Unemployed Persons of the FBiH, the relevant authorities of the FBiH or Cantons are responsible for establishing measures to increase employment rates and improve the situation of employed persons. The FBiH add that the work plan of the FBiH Employment Institute provides for the various forms of support for the promotion of employment, self-employment, preparation for entering the labour market, and professional development and training. These measures seek to integrate unemployed persons into the labour market, particularly in relation to persons belonging to hard-to-employ categories of unemployed persons. The Committee notes that section 23 of the Law gives priority to persons with disabilities in employment. With respect to the Brčko District of BiH, the Committee notes that the Law on Employment and Rights during Unemployment and the Labour Law of the Brčko District provide for professional training, preparation for employment and special protections for women, minors and persons who are not fit for work. In relation to the RS, the Committee notes that the RS Employment Strategy 2011–15 established a system for the registration of unemployed persons with the RS Employment Bureau (RSEB). The Committee notes the Government’s indication that the RSEB implemented three projects providing support for employment in the RS from 2013 to 2015, through which a total of 4,522 persons were employed. In October 2016, the RS National Assembly adopted the RS Employment Strategy 2016–20, which seeks to increase employment and stimulate economic activity in RS through the implementation of thirteen operational goals and fifty specific measures. The Committee notes the Government’s indication that, according to the records of the RSEB, implementation of these measures led to the employment of 34,593 persons in 2015. The Government adds that the measures set out in the RS Employment Action Plan for 2017 seek, inter alia, to structurally reform the role of the RSEB and focus its activity on employment intermediation. The Committee requests the Government to provide detailed updated information, including statistical data disaggregated by sex, age and administrative entity, on the impact of the policies and measures implemented to promote full, productive and freely chosen employment, including the employment promotion activities carried out under the Employment Strategy of Republika Srpska 2016–20.

Employment trends. The FBiH reports that there were a number of positive changes in the labour market in 2016. The RS indicates that a gradual stabilization of the labour market began in 2013, adding that numerous measures taken by the RS and other stakeholders addressed the increasing unemployment rate. The Committee notes that, according to data from the FBiH Statistics Institute, 457,974 workers were employed in the FBiH in 2016. It further notes that data from the Labour Force Survey indicates that the employment rate in the FBiH stood at 30.5 per cent in 2016, while the average unemployment rate was 25.6 per cent, a reduction of 3.31 per cent in comparison with the 2015 average. The Committee notes the high unemployment rate among young persons 15–24 years of age, which decreased from 64.9 per cent in 2015 to 55.1 per cent in 2016. The Committee further notes that, according to the ILOSTAT database, the general unemployment rate for young persons was 45.8 per cent in 2017. At the end of 2016, the largest percentage of those registered as unemployed in the FBiH (44.24 per cent) were in the 30–49 age group, followed by persons under the age of 30 (32.5 per cent) and persons over the age of 50 (25.26 per cent). In 2016, 133,037 persons were removed from the records of the Cantonal employment services, 115,379 persons were registered as unemployed and 92,263 persons were placed in employment. This represents an increase of 15,671 in comparison with 2015. According to the ILOSTAT database, in 2017, the general unemployment rate was 20.5 per cent, whereas the unemployment rate for men and for women was 18.9 per cent and 23.1 per cent, respectively. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide statistical data disaggregated by sex and age concerning the size and distribution of the labour force, including the size of the informal economy and employment trends in relation to employment, unemployment, and visible underemployment.

Undeclared work. In their observations, the workers’ organizations indicate that the informal economy is widespread, maintaining that the Government has not made serious efforts to tackle this issue effectively. They emphasize that nearly one-third of all persons who are employed are working in the informal economy, trapped there primarily due to poor access to the labour market, slow job creation in the formal economy and the lack of skills matching labour market demands. They add that workers in rural areas face a higher probability of remaining in informal employment in comparison with workers in other sectors. The Committee notes that, according to the RS Employment Strategy 2016–20, informality is predominately present in agriculture, making up about two-thirds of informal employment, with informal employment concentrated among the rural population. The Committee therefore once again requests the Government to provide detailed updated information on the measures taken or envisaged to facilitate the transition of undeclared workers in the informal economy to employment in the formal economy, with special attention to the agricultural sector and rural communities.

Workers vulnerable to decent work deficits. The FBiH indicates that a number of gender-sensitive programmes implemented by the FBiH Employment Institute focus on specific groups of workers vulnerable to decent work deficits: women; young persons; persons with disabilities; persons belonging to the Roma community; persons over the age of 40; and the long-term unemployed. The RS reports that 2,859 persons were employed through Social Safety Nets and the Employment Support Project. In addition, 543 persons were employed in 2015 through a project to support the employment of persons over the age of 45 and 135 persons were employed through an employment support project targeting the Roma minority from 2011 to 2015. It adds that the RS Employment Action Plan for 2017 sets out a number of measures aimed at increasing the employability of persons under the age of 30, persons over the age of 50 and persons belonging to the Roma community. In their observations, the workers’ organizations allege that the 2015–18 Reform Agenda fails to address the interests of women, workers in the informal economy and workers with disabilities. In addition, the workers’ organizations observe that women have low participation levels in political and public affairs, noting that the gender pay gap in BiH is larger than the EU average. The Committee requests the Government to provide detailed updated information, including statistical data disaggregated by age and sex in the three administrative entities, on the nature and impact of measures taken to promote full, productive, freely chosen and sustainable employment for persons vulnerable to decent work deficits, including women, young persons, persons over the age of 50, informal workers, the long-term unemployed, persons with disabilities and members of the Roma community. Noting, moreover, the gender pay gap and the higher rates of unemployment for women, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on specific measures taken to promote employment for women at all levels and across all sectors, including in decision-making positions.

Employment of young persons. The Committee notes that, according to the ILOSTAT database, the youth unemployment rate in the country stood at 45.8 per cent in 2017. The Committee notes that both FBiH and the RS took measures to promote the employment of young persons. In this regard, the RSEB implemented five projects from 2011 to 2014 to support young persons in gaining work experience, through which 3,650 persons were employed as trainees. Furthermore, the RS Employment Action Plan for 2017 contemplates the promotion of socially useful employment for youth, for which 50,000 Bosnian convertible marka (BAM) are allocated. In their observations, the workers’ organizations express concerns in relation to the high rate of youth unemployment and the likelihood that they will remain in long-term unemployment and the mass exodus of young educated persons from the country seeking work elsewhere. The Committee requests the Government to provide updated detailed information, including disaggregated statistical data on the impact of the measures taken by the three administrative entities of the country to promote full, productive, freely chosen and lasting employment for young workers.

Vocational education and training. The Committee notes that the FBiH Employment Institute and the Cantonal employment services are responsible for implementing the Job Preparation Programme: from Training to Employment, which provides co-financing for the training of unemployed persons to enable them to acquire professional skills tailored to the needs of employers. In respect of the RS, the Committee notes the establishment of 11 job clubs and 6 Information, Counselling and Training Centres which provided job search assistance to more than 34,376 beneficiaries from 2011 to 2015, leading to the employment of 9,172 persons. Furthermore, the RS Employment Action Plan for 2017 contemplates the development, financing and delivery of training aimed at enhancing the employability of active jobseekers, for which BAM500,000 are allocated. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on the nature and impact of measures taken to improve vocational education and training and on their impact on the employability and competitiveness of the national labour force.

Article 3. Consultation with the social partners. The Committee notes the Government’s indication that the tripartite FBHI Economic and Social Council discusses all measures related to economic and social policy prior to their formal adoption and that the RS Employment Action Plan for 2017 was adopted after consultation with the social partners. In their observations, the workers’ organizations allege that the social partners were not able to participate in the development and implementation of the 2015–18 Reform Agenda and that this lack of participation and transparency continued in relation to laws and policies adopted by regional governments in 2016. They further allege that the 2015 Labour Law undermines the strategic position of trade unions and collective agreements. The Committee requests the Government to provide detailed information on the nature and extent of the involvement of the social partners in the development, implementation, monitoring and review of employment policy measures and programmes in the different administrative entities.

Brazil

Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122) (ratification: 1969)

The Committee notes the observations of the Trade Union of Pernambuco Doctors (SIMEPE) and the Federal Council of Medicine (CFM) of 21 January 2015, as well as the Government’s response thereto, dated 5 November 2015. In addition, the Committee notes the observations of the Single Confederation of Workers (CUT) of 1 September 2017, as well as the observations of the National Association of Labour Court Judges (ANAMATRA) received on 1 June 2018. The Committee requests the Government to provide its comments in respect of the observations made by the CUT and ANAMATRA.

Legislative developments. In its observations, the CUT alleges that the Labour Reforms (Reforma Trabalhista) introduced by Law No. 13467 of 13 July 2017, which modified the Consolidated Labour Law of 1943, substantially alter Brazilian employment policy. The CUT observes that, from the workers’ perspective, the Labour Reforms will have extremely negative impacts on the creation of decent jobs and thus directly contravene the objectives of the Convention. In particular, the CUT recalls that Article 1 of the Convention requires the national employment policy to be designed with the objective of promoting full, productive and freely chosen employment. It adds that the jobs to be created through the vehicle of public policies should be productive and freely chosen, and workers should not be subjected to socio-economic conditions that force them to accept any kind of job in order to survive. In this context, the CUT points to section 442-B of Law No. 13467, which establishes the category of the “autonomous exclusive” who may work exclusively and continuously for an employer, yet not be considered an employee as defined under the Consolidated Labour Law. The CUT alleges that section 442-B destroys the very notion of employment, employer and employee, directly affecting employment policy. Moreover, the CUT alleges that the Labour Reforms were adopted in contravention of Article 3 of the Convention, as they were approved without any consultation with the workers’ organizations or the persons affected. While noting that the Government has not yet provided its comments in response to the observations of the CUT and ANAMATRA, the Committee nevertheless requests the Government to provide detailed information on the manner in which Law No. 13467 – particularly section 442-B – has been applied, and to communicate copies of any judicial decisions concerning the application of the provisions of this Law.

Article 1 of the Convention. Implementation of an active employment policy in the framework of a coordinated social and economic policy. Employment trends. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to continue providing detailed information on the policies implemented and the measures adopted to achieve the objectives of the Convention, as well as information on the impact of the Programme to Accelerate Growth (PAC) and the Better Brazil plan (Brasil Maior) plan in promoting productive employment. The Government reports that its strategy to create jobs and generate income is centred on stimulating innovation and productive activity through the provision of credit, which it considers to be a sustainable means of integrating persons into the productive economy. It adds that the objective of its Programme for Employment Creation and Income Generation (FAT-PROGER) is to stimulate income generation through providing lines of credit at subsidized rates, with the aim of promoting increased production, thus increasing demand for labour. The Government indicates that FAT-PROGER makes long-term investments in small businesses, cooperatives and productive associations and is present in 3,600 municipalities. The Government indicates that, in 2016, FAT-PROGER granted 5 billion Brazilian reals (BRL) in credit lines for businesses. The Government also highlights the INOVACRED Programme, which forms part of the Brasil Maior plan, with the aim of supporting economic growth by investing in innovation. From 2014 to 2017, INOVACRED made BRL533 million available to companies for this purpose. In addition, the National Programme for Guided Productive Microcredit (PNMPO) extends microcredit to small entrepreneurs through a network of specialized institutions that also provide technical guidance necessary for the sustained development of these undertakings. In 2016, the PNMOPO made BRL11.18 billion available to 3.7 million beneficiaries. The Government notes that women make up 60 per cent of PNMOPO clients, and that 90 per cent of all clients are own-account operators. The Committee also notes the rise in unemployment which, according to data published by the Economic Commission for Latin America and the Caribbean (ECLAC), rose to 13.7 per cent in the first quarter of 2017, falling in the third quarter to 12.4 per cent. The Committee requests the Government to provide updated detailed information, including statistical data disaggregated by sex and age on trends in urban and rural areas and in the different regions, on employment, unemployment and visible underemployment. It further requests the Government to continue to provide comprehensive information on measures taken or envisaged to achieve the objectives of the Convention, as well as on the impact of such measures.

Education and vocational training. Groups vulnerable to decent work deficits. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to continue to provide information on measures adopted to increase the labour market participation of specific groups, such as young persons, older workers, female jobseekers, migrant workers, ethnic minorities and persons with disabilities. The Government reports that the National Skills Plan (PNQ) was restructured in April 2017 and is now known as the Brazilian Programme for Social and Professional Skills (Qualifica Brasil). Its objective is to promote qualification and professional certification in the framework of the unemployment insurance programme within the National Employment Service (SINE). Qualifica Brasil places priority on specific groups, including the unemployed, those working in jobs affected by technological changes, young persons and others. It offers qualification courses, including distance learning and free courses at participating institutions, and professional certification recognizing acquired knowledge, competencies and professional experience. The Committee notes the Government’s indication that, according to the Brazilian Statistical and Geographical Institute (IBGE), more than 40 million people – almost half of young persons between 15 and 29 – are interested in professional courses, but only 2.2 per cent have the means to do so. With respect to youth employment, the Government indicates that the programme Projove Trabalhador – Juventude Cidadã of the Ministry of Labour and Employment is being restructured. The programme, which seeks to prepare young persons aged between 18 and 29 years for the labour market, benefited 1,331,948 young people between 2008 and 2013. The Government also refers to the Pronatec programme created in 2011 to extend technical and professional education courses, indicating that in the second half of 2017, the Ministries of Labour and Education will launch a study analysing the placement of qualified young persons in the labour market. In addition, the Government refers to the Brazilian apprenticeship programme, which aims to promote the professional qualification and integration of young persons aged 14–24 into the labour market. According to the data published by the Ministry of Labour, from 2005 to 2017, 3,051,942 young persons participated in the apprenticeship programme. The Committee reiterates its request that the Government provide information on the measures adopted to increase the labour market participation of groups vulnerable to decent work deficits, such as young persons, older workers, women jobseekers, migrant workers, ethnic minorities and persons with disabilities.

The More Doctors (Mais Médicos) Programme. In their observations, the SIMEPE and CFM allege non-observance of a number of ILO Conventions, including Convention No. 122, in relation to the More Doctors (Mais Médicos) Programme. They indicate that in creating the programme, the Government engaged the services of Cuban doctors working for the Cuban Ministry of Health as cheap labour, paying them less than Brazilian doctors, under conditions in which they were not able to freely choose their employment. Moreover, the SIMEPE and CFM allege that the Cuban doctors were being sent to Brazil as medical exchange students, to perfect their skills, and were restricted from practising medicine, whereas in reality they worked providing healthcare services in rural areas for the State Health Service (SUS). In its 2015 response, the Government indicates that the project was established to address the shortage of doctors in the country, particularly in rural areas, and selects both Brazilian and non-Brazilian medical graduates to provide primary care services in underserved areas. The Government indicates that the project is an international medical exchange programme rather than an employment relationship sensu stricto, referring to Law No. 12.871/2013, which created the programme, section 17 of which provides that “the activities carried out in the More Doctors Programme do not create any relationship”. The Government adds that the activities carried out are not for economic gain, but that the participating doctors receive scholarships and other allowances for their travel and installation expenses and that, after the first year, it was able to attract participants from more than 40 different nationalities, in addition to Cuban doctors employed by the Cuban Ministry of Health. The Government indicates that the programme combined a set of incentives – educational, monetary, regulatory and clinical support – to attract doctors to the most underserved areas. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the current status of the More Doctors Programme, including statistical information disaggregated by nationality, on the number of participants, as well as information on the conditions afforded by the programme, including the amounts received in the form of remuneration, allowances, etc.

Article 3. Consultations with the social partners. Noting the CUT’s observations concerning the adoption of the Labour Reforms, the Committee requests the Government to provide updated information on consultations held with the social partners and affected persons with respect to the development and implementation of employment policy and active labour market measures, including for groups vulnerable to decent work deficits.
Canada

Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122) (ratification: 1966)

The Committee notes the observations made by the Canadian Labour Congress (CLC), received on 31 August 2017 and later transmitted with the Government’s report together with the observations of the Quebec Employers’ Council (CPQ).

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Employment trends and active labour market measures. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to indicate how, pursuant to Article 2 of the Convention, it keeps under review the measures and policies adopted according to the results achieved in pursuit of the objectives of the Convention specified in Article 1. The Committee notes the detailed information provided by the Government concerning the labour market measures adopted and envisaged at the federal and provincial levels. The Government indicates that over 2 billion Canadian dollars (CAD) are invested each year in the Labour Market Development Agreements (LMDAs) with provinces and territories to support the unemployed with employment assistance and training. Under the LMDAs, employment benefits enable current and former Employment Insurance (EI) claimants to gain skills and work experience through a combination of interventions, such as training and wage subsidies. The Government adds that the EI Act was amended in 2016 and 2017 with a view to eliminating the higher EI eligibility requirements that restricted the access for new entrants and re-entrants to the labour market, extending the definition of former claimants from three to five years, and broadening worker eligibility to allow under-represented groups to access EI-funded skills training and employment support under the LMDAs. However, the CLC points out that the Government did not invest in significantly wider access to EI regular benefits, therefore workers may find themselves with access to EI-funded training opportunities, but without income support provided by eligibility for EI regular benefits. Furthermore, based on the outputs of the consultations held in 2016 with the provinces, territories and other stakeholders, the Government announced in Budget 2017 reforms to the LMDAs by introducing the new Workforce Development Agreements (WDAs), which complements the LMDAs and consolidates the Canada Job Fund Agreements, the Labour Market Agreements for Persons with Disabilities and the Targeted Initiative for Older Workers (TIOW). Under the WDAs, additional investment is provided for development and delivery of programmes and services that help Canadians get training, develop their skills and gain work experience. The WDAs offer flexibility to respond to the diverse employment and skills training needs of Canadians, including those with disabilities, those further removed from the labour market and employers. The Committee also notes that in its observations, the CPQ welcomes the Innovation and Competences Plan included in Budget 2017 with the objectives of creating a higher number of good and well-paid jobs and growing the middle class. In addition, in Budget 2018 measures are envisaged to increase the access to the Working Income Tax Benefit (WITB), which is a refundable tax credit that supplements the earnings of low-income workers. By letting low-income workers take home more money while they work, the benefit encourages more people to join and remain in the workforce. Finally, the Committee notes the concern raised by CLC about the lack of an active policy to promote full, productive and freely chosen employment, and articulated and integrated into socio-economic decision-making, as required by Article 1 of the Convention. The CLC indicates that the aims set out in Article 2 are difficult to coherently implement through measurable objectives that could lead to concrete reporting for the evaluation of programmes. With regards to the employment trends, according to the Labour Force Survey of Statistics Canada, seasonally adjusted employment increased from 17,991,100 in June 2016 to 18,628,000 in June 2018, and the unemployment rate decreased from 6.8 per cent to 6 per cent during the same period. Nevertheless, the CLC points out that job quality has declined and part-time employment continues to represent a significant and growing share of the job market. The CLC adds that young workers, women, indigenous people, newcomers to Canada and workers with disabilities are more likely to be working in low-wage jobs with unpredictable schedules, no benefits or sick days, and low job security. The Committee requests the Government to continue providing up-to-date information on the measures adopted or envisaged to achieve the objectives of the Convention and, in particular, on how these have helped the beneficiaries obtain full, productive and sustainable employment. In light of the concerns expressed by the CLC, the Committee reiterates its request that the Government indicate the manner in which active labour market measures are kept under review within the framework of an overall coordinated economic and social policy. It also requests the Government to provide up-to-date information, including statistical data disaggregated by sex, age and economic sector, on the current situation and trends regarding the active population, employment, unemployment and underemployment.

Article 3. Participation of the social partners in the formulation and implementation of policies. In reply to the Committee’s previous comments of 2014, the Government indicates that under the Forum of Labour Market Ministers (FLMM), broad-based consultations on Labour Market Transfer Agreements were held in 2016 with experts, employers, workers and service providers. The Committee notes that consultations with workers’ and employers’ and other stakeholders on different employment measures are envisaged in Budget 2018. The Committee notes, however, that the CLC highlights deficiencies with respect to the application of this Article of the Convention in relation to consultations with workers’ organizations. It adds that despite the fact that workers’ organizations are informed about employment policies, their views are not taken into account. The CLC regrets the lack of an institutionalized process for taking into account the views of the social partners with respect to the development and implementation of employment policies. In view of the concerns raised by the CLC, the Committee reiterates its request that the Government provide... detailed information on the frequency, content and outcomes of effective consultations held with the social partners on the matters covered by the Convention.

Chile

Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122) (ratification: 1968)

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Implementation of an active employment policy. In response to its previous comments, the Committee notes the information provided in the Government’s report regarding the numerous programmes adopted to increase participation, mainly of women and young persons in a socially vulnerable situation, in the labour market. The Government refers, inter alia, to the “More skilled” (Más Capaz) programme, which aims to support the entry and retention in the labour market of women, young persons and persons with disabilities who belong, according to socio-economic classification, to the 60 per cent most disadvantaged section of the population, and who have no or little work, that is, whose contribution rate amounts to 50 per cent or less over the previous 12 months. There are three lines of action in the “More skilled” programme: standard line of action (2015–18); women entrepreneurs line of action; and persons with disabilities line of action. The Government also indicates that ProEmplea runs five programmes of the Office of the Under-Secretary for Labour aimed at job creation and labour integration for groups in a vulnerable situation, such as women, children, persons with disabilities and former prisoners. The joint objective of these programmes is the promotion of employment and employability through the design, coordination and oversight of employment policies and programmes, with a view to facilitating labour integration for persons in the most vulnerable situations, and to provide a source of labour to places where the labour force demand has shrunk because of an emergency. These programmes are divided into “emergency employment” programmes, which include the programme for community investment and the programmes under the National Training and Employment Service (SENCE); and the “employability-boosting” programmes, which include the programme for the employment support “sistema Chile solidario” and the programme for the development of professional skills for women “Chile solidario”. The Government also provides information on incentives granted to enterprises (the “Encourage people” programme and the “On-the-job training” programme) and benefits for workers (youth employment grants and vouchers for women workers) with a view to boosting employment and training for young persons and women. With regard to the labour market trends, the Committee notes that based on the National Employment Survey of the National Statistics Institute (INE) and the report regarding the unemployment rate was 7.4 per cent for women and 6.8 per cent for men; the participation rate was 48.5 per cent for women and 70.2 per cent for men; and the employment rate was 44.9 per cent for women and 65.4 per cent for men. The Committee notes that the unemployment rates are higher in certain regions, such as Tarapaca (9.2 per cent for men and 7.5 per cent for women), Atacama (7.7 per cent for men and 9 per cent in women) and Antofagasta (6.9 per cent for men and 10.8 per cent for women). Lastly, the Committee notes the establishment of implementation reports relating to employment programmes with a view to conducting quantitative monitoring of the achievement of those programmes with fiscal support; and the establishment of the Employment Monitoring Committee to coordinate those programmes. The Committee requests the Government to provide a copy of the implementation reports related to those measures. Furthermore, the Committee requests the Government to provide updated statistical information on the evolution of the labour market, particularly on the rates of the economically active population, employment and unemployment, disaggregated by sex, age and region.

Coordination of vocational and technical education and training measures with employment policy. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to continue providing information on the coordination of vocational education and training policies with employment policy. In this respect the Government recalls in its report that the National System for the Certification of Vocational Skills (ChileValora) is composed of Sectoral Vocational Skills Bodies (OSCL), that are tripartite and invite the most representative sectors of the economy to participate in the development of skills-based projects. The Government indicates that, depending on the characteristics of the production sector and its formation, there are OSCL which include representatives from the rural sector and the informal economy (family agriculture, recyclers and domestic workers). Based on the work of the OSCL, the Vocational Skills Catalogue was compiled, containing all relevant vocational profiles, organized by economic sectors and sub-sectors, according to which persons are assessed and qualified. The Vocational Skills Catalogue is available to the training system and educational institutions in order to incorporate skills into the design of training plans, narrow the gap between workforce supply and demand, link skills with the various curriculum and education levels, and facilitate recognition of qualifications in formal education processes. The Government also indicates that, as a result of sectoral tripartite dialogue, since 2015 it has been making steady progress in the development of vocational paths combining work experience and training which respond to the reality and needs of different productive sectors. The Government also indicates that the mission of the National Employment Observatory, which is part of the National Training and Employment Service, is to identify existing gaps between supply and demand in labour market occupations and to anticipate possible future gaps. In particular, the Observatory’s objective is to improve workers’ employability and the country’s productivity by disseminating information on the importance of training and on the link between job vacancies and seekers. The National Observatory has a central office and a network of 15 regional observatories, which each have an advisory council composed of representatives of the Government, workers’ and employers’ organizations, and academia. The Government also refers to the skills training programme for persons in vulnerable situations and provides them with subsidies for each day of training; and to the on-the-job training programme which offers incentives to enterprises that hire unemployed persons or first-time jobseekers with a view to developing particular skills through the on-the-job training and a training voucher. The Committee requests the Government to provide detailed and updated information on the measures adopted or envisaged in cooperation with the social partners and representatives of various sectors, including representatives of the rural sector and informal economy, to improve the level of qualifications and coordinate education and training policies with potential job opportunities, and on the results of the implementation of those measures.

Micro- and small enterprises (MYPE). The Committee notes the Government’s reference to the implementation of the business and enterprise voucher which aims to boost the competitiveness and productivity of micro- and small enterprises. Through the programme, owners or managers of micro- or small enterprises are provided with a certificate giving them access to a training course to improve their training in areas that will boost competitiveness and productivity. The Committee requests the Government to continue providing detailed information on the initiatives adopted or envisaged to support micro- and small enterprises as well as on their application in practice.

Article 3. Consultation with the social partners. The Committee notes with interest the formation on 8 May 2017 of the Higher Labour Council, a tripartite and consultative body. Its permanent functions are, inter alia, to: (i) develop, analyse and discuss proposals and recommendations on public policy relating to labour relations and the labour market; (ii) propose initiatives intended to incentivize job creation, boost productivity and increase the participation of women, young persons, persons with disabilities and other groups of workers in a vulnerable situation in the workforce, improving their employability; and (iii) conduct, directly or through third parties, diagnostic investigations or studies on the status of labour relations and the operation of the labour market in the country. The Committee also notes the Government’s information on the content of several of the Council’s meetings held to date. The Government indicates, for example, that in its second session, Council members analysed information available on the implementation of the labour reform, particularly the labour market indicators defined on the basis of data registered by the Labour Directorate. The Government also refers to the implementation of the programme on social dialogue working groups within the framework of the social dialogue unit of the Labour Ministry. The purpose of this programme is to establish social dialogue working groups to help set up national and regional social dialogue forums on high-priority issues, such as employment policy. The Committee requests the Government to provide updated information on the manner in which the social partners participate in the design, implementation, evaluation and revision of employment policies within the Higher Labour Council and the social dialogue working groups on employment policy.

Costa Rica

Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122) (ratification: 1966)

The Committee notes the observations of the Rerum Novarum Workers’ Confederation (CTRN), received on 31 August 2017. It also notes the observations of the International Organisation of Employers (IOE) and the Costa Rican Confederation of Democratic Workers (CCTD), received on 1 September and 23 September 2017, respectively. The Committee further notes the Government’s replies to the observations of the CCTD, which are included in its report. The Committee requests the Government to send its comments on the observations of the CTRN and the IOE.

Article 1 of the Convention. Formulation and implementation of an active employment policy. In its previous comments, the Committee asked the Government to provide information on the progress of the “National employment and production strategy (ENEDP)” in achieving the objectives of the Convention. The Committee notes the detailed information included in the summary of the “Annual technical report on the ENEDP support project”, provided by the Government. According to the aforementioned report, improvements were made in 2016 with regard to: (i) building institutional and managerial capacity for effective implementation of the abovementioned strategy through measures such as expansion of the national directory of organizations in the social solidarity economy and the creation of spaces for coordination and follow-up with institutions involved in implementation of the ENEDP; (ii) strengthening social dialogue, including through the establishment of the preparatory framework for creating a national forum for tripartite dialogue on the transition from the informal economy; (iii) formulating and implementing specific policies to improve ENEDP vocational training and job placement programmes; (iv) the provision of technical advice for the Presidential Economic Council in relation to the formulation of national policy on productive transformation and the development of an agenda for research into the links between macroeconomic policy and employment; and (v) the conditions for the integration of socially vulnerable groups (women in general and female domestic workers in particular) with a view to safeguarding their labour rights. The Committee also notes that the CTRN, in its observations, maintains that the labour rights of workers are not guaranteed in practice, particularly as regards payment of the minimum wage, bonuses and overtime. The CTRN emphasizes that social inequality and informality have increased in the last few decades. The CTRN also refers to the drafting of a Tax Reform Bill, which provides for the deregulation and flexibilization of labour rights of public sector workers. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the impact of the measures taken to achieve the objectives of the “National employment and production strategy (ENEDP)”. The Committee also requests the Government to provide information on the status of the process of adoption of the Tax Reform Bill and to send a copy when it is adopted.

Article 3. Participation of the social partners. In its previous comments, the Committee asked the Government to provide information on the consultations held with the social partners, particularly those working in the rural sector and the informal economy, with a view to enlisting the support needed to implement the employment policy. The Committee notes the Government’s indication that a tripartite round table was convened in 2017 regarding the adoption of the Transition from the Informal to the Formal Economy Recommendation, 2015 (No. 204), in which the main workers’ and employers’ organizations and public institutions took part. The Government adds that the round table reached consensus on the need for action with regard to, inter alia, simplification of taxation and improved access to technical training and social protection. In this context, tripartite technical committees were also formed to draw up specific measures for achieving the stated objectives. However, the Committee notes that the Government has not provided information on the holding of consultations with the social partners, including those working in the rural sector and the informal economy, in relation to implementation of the employment policy. The Committee once again requests the Government to provide detailed, up-to-date information on the consultations held with representatives of the social partners on the matters covered by the Convention, including with representatives of the rural sector and the informal economy.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Cyprus

Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122) (ratification: 1966)

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Implementation of an active employment policy. Labour trends. In its previous observation, the Committee noted an alarming deterioration of the employment situation in Cyprus and requested the Government to indicate the measures taken to address the situation. The Committee notes the employment measures implemented by the Government since 2014 to tackle unemployment, including subsidized employment schemes aiming to create new jobs, training and work experience schemes aiming to promote job retention and enhance employability. The Government indicates that employment policies and measures and labour market reforms are designed and regularly reviewed, taking into account the Government’s goals and the country’s National Reform Programme, the basic vehicle guiding implementation of the “Europe 2020” Strategy at the national level. The Government adds that the effectiveness of some of the measures taken was assessed in evaluation studies conducted by external experts. The Committee notes that the unemployment rate, after a substantial increase from 2011 to 2014, began to decline in 2015, when the effects of the global economic recession on the labour market began to diminish. According to available Labour Force Survey data, the unemployment rate decreased from 16.1 per cent in 2014 to 13 per cent in 2016. According to the latest ILOSTAT data, the unemployment rate declined further, reaching to 11.1 per cent in 2017. The employment rate increased during the same period, from 67.6 per cent in 2014, to 68.8 per cent in 2016. In addition, according to the European Commission Country Report Cyprus 2018, the employment rate increased further, reaching to 71 per cent in 2017. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken or envisaged to address the national employment situation. It also requests the Government to provide updated information, including statistics disaggregated by sex and age, with respect to labour market trends, specifically employment, unemployment and visible unemployment.

Specific categories of workers. The Committee notes the information provided by the Government concerning targeted employment measures for specific groups of persons vulnerable to decent work deficits. In this respect, the Government is implementing a series of schemes that provide incentives to encourage enterprises in the private sector to employ members of the targeted groups, including the long-term unemployed, young persons, older workers, those with chronic diseases and persons with disabilities. The Committee notes that 60 per cent of the persons that took part in the “Scheme providing incentives for hiring disadvantaged individuals” remained in employment six months after completing the Scheme. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide updated detailed information, including statistical data disaggregated by age and sex, on the nature and impact of active labour market measures implemented to enhance the employability and promote the employment of specific categories of disadvantaged workers, including but not limited to the long-term unemployed, young people, older persons, those with chronic diseases and persons with disabilities in terms of creating productive and lasting employment opportunities.

Women’s employment. The Committee notes that the employment rate for women is markedly lower than for men. Moreover, unemployment rates continue to be slightly higher for women than for men. For example, in 2016, the employment rate stood at 64.1 per cent for women, compared to 73.9 per cent for men. According to ILOSTAT data, in 2017, the unemployment rate stood at 11.3 per cent for women, compared to 10.9 per cent for men. Regarding measures taken to increase the employment of women, the Committee notes the Government’s indication that the evaluation studies conducted by external experts found that 97 per cent of the women that took part in the Scheme for the Improvement of the Employability of Economically Inactive Women were still in the labour market six months after participating in the Scheme. Noting the measures taken by the Government to promote the employment of specific categories of workers, the Committee recalls that, in its General Survey of 1998 on the Vocational Rehabilitation and Employment (Disabled Persons), it highlighted the employment barriers for women with disabilities. Recalling the 2003 ILO Global Report Time for equality at work, which notes that the “interplay of identities results in experiences of exclusion and disadvantage that are unique to those with multiple identities”, the Committee notes that women who also belong to disadvantaged groups face double discrimination. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the nature and impact of measures adopted with a view to promoting the employment of women, including economically inactive women, particularly women who belong to disadvantaged groups, promoting their access to decent and lasting employment at all levels and across all economic sectors.

Youth employment. The Committee notes that the youth unemployment rate decreased, falling from 36 per cent in 2014 to 29.1 per cent in 2016 and, according to ILOSTAT, decreased further to 24.7 per cent in 2017. At the same time, youth employment increased from 25.8 per cent in 2014 to 26.1 per cent in 2016. The Government refers to a series of schemes that provide incentives to encourage enterprises in the private sector to employ young persons. The Committee takes note of the training subsidy schemes offering job placements for unemployed young secondary and tertiary graduates to enable them to acquire work experience, with the aim of enhancing their employability and facilitating their smooth integration into the labour market. According to the evaluation studies referenced in the Government’s report, these job placement schemes significantly improved the employability of young persons, since the vast majority of the participants were employed after completing their participation and continued to work in the same enterprise or organization that employed them during their participation in the scheme. The Committee requests the Government to continue providing information on the measures adopted to facilitate the labour market integration of young persons and the impact of these programmes. The Committee also requests the Government to continue to provide statistical information on trends in youth employment, disaggregated by gender and age.

Education and training policies and programmes. The Committee notes the training measures being implemented since 2014, including accelerated training programmes, subsidy schemes for vocational training combined with employment, as well as training schemes for the long-term unemployed, young people and persons with disabilities. It also notes that subsidy schemes offering job placement and job training were planned for the provision of care services for guaranteed minimum income recipients and for the provision of care services for persons with paraplegia and quadriplegia. The Committee requests the Government to provide updated information on the nature and impact of the measures taken to provide and promote education and training, including job placement schemes for graduates, and on the relation of these measures to prospective employment opportunities.

Article 3. Participation of the social partners. The Government indicates that consultations with the social partners and other stakeholders on the formulation and implementation of employment policy measures take place in tripartite social dialogue bodies functioning under the auspices of the Ministry of Labour and Social Insurance. The Labour Advisory Board is the principal tripartite body; however, the Committee notes that issues pertaining to employment policy are discussed by the tripartite social dialogue bodies and specialized issues are also discussed in ad hoc Tripartite Technical Committees. The Committee requests the Government to provide more detailed information on the manner in which the experience and views of the social partners have been taken into account in the formulation and implementation of employment policy measures. The Government is also requested to indicate to what extent consultations have been held with representatives of the persons affected by the measures taken, such as young people, older persons and persons with disabilities, in relation to the formulation and implementation of active employment policies and programmes as contemplated under the Convention.

Djibouti

Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122) (ratification: 1978)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government’s report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments initially made in 2014.

Article 1 of the Convention. Adoption and implementation of an active employment policy. ILO technical assistance. In response to previous comments, the Government indicates in its report that, although the strategy for the formulation of a national employment policy was commenced in April 2003, and new structures have been established, the preparation of a national employment policy paper has still not been completed. The Committee notes that the National Employment Forum held in 2010 showed the need to develop a new employment policy adapted to labour market needs, which will have to target as a priority the reform of the vocational training system and the improvement of employment support services. The Government indicates that, out of a population of 818,159 inhabitants of working age, recent estimates place the unemployment rate at 48.4 per cent. It also indicates that, following a mission for the evaluation of technical cooperation undertaken by the ILO in March 2011, the Government reiterated its commitment to developing a Djibouti Decent Work Programme. It adds that it is still awaiting Office support for this purpose. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken to ensure that employment, as a key element of poverty reduction, is central to macroeconomic and social policies, and on the progress made in the adoption of a national policy for the achievement of full employment within the meaning of the Convention.

Youth employment. The Government indicates that in 2012, despite a certain improvement, unemployment particularly affected young persons with higher education degrees. Moreover, although the country does not currently have a formal strategy to promote youth employment, several initiatives have been established to improve the operation of the labour market, promote entrepreneurship and provide training adapted to labour market needs. The Committee invites the Government to provide... information on the manner in which the measures adopted have resulted in productive and lasting employment opportunities for young persons, and on the collaboration of the social partners in their implementation.

Article 2. Collection and use of employment data. In March 2014, the Government provided the summary of the employment situation prepared by the National Employment and Skills Observatory. The number of jobs is increasing (30,118 jobs created in 2007, 35,393 in 2008 and 37,837 in 2010). The Committee invites the Government to indicate the measures taken to improve the labour market information system and to consolidate the mechanisms linking this system with decision-making in the field of employment policy. It also requests the Government to provide updated statistical data disaggregated by age and sex, as well as any other relevant data relating to the size and distribution of the workforce, the nature and scope of unemployment and underemployment and the respective trends.

Article 3. Collaboration of the social partners. The Committee recalls the importance of the consultations required by the Convention and once again requests the Government to provide information on the measures adopted or envisaged for the consultation of the representatives of the persons affected on employment policies.

France

Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122) (ratification: 1971)

The Committee notes the observations of the General Confederation of Labour–Force Ouvrière (CGT–FO), received on 20 October 2017. The Committee requests the Government to provide its comments in this regard.

Article 1(2) of the Convention. Implementation of an active employment policy. In response to the Committee’s previous comments, the Government indicates in its report that several measures to reduce the cost of labour have been approved and implemented in order to promote employment. In this context, it indicates that, since 2015, the Tax Credit for Competitiveness and Employment (CICE) has been supplemented by exemptions from social security contributions introduced in the framework of the Responsibility and Solidarity Pact. The first phase of the Pact, implemented in 2015, reduced employer social security contributions for wages lower than 1.6 times the minimum interoccupational growth wage (SMIC) and the social security contributions of the self-employed. The Government adds that, since 2016, small and medium-sized enterprises (SMEs) have benefited from support for the recruitment of low-skilled workers through the “SME recruitment” mechanism, which provides a quarterly bonus of €500 when a worker is recruited with a fixed-term contract (CDD) of more than six months or a permanent contract (CDI), earning up to 1.3 times the SMIC. It indicates that this mechanism, which came to an end in 2017, aimed to boost recruitment. The Government indicates that, since 2015, job creation in the commercial sector has been growing, with 290,000 jobs created since the first quarter of 2015. It adds that the recruitment bonus for fixed-term contracts of more than six months and permanent contracts benefited over 2 million workers, with the creation of 30,000 jobs in 2016 and 45,000 jobs in 2017. The Committee notes that combating unemployment and precarious employment has been one of the Government’s ongoing priorities and it has strengthened the capacities of enterprises to adapt to their circumstances, facilitated recruitment with permanent contracts through quality training that matches workers’ skills with the needs of enterprises and improved the unemployment insurance system. The Government also indicates that a policy of increasing the minimum wage has supplemented these measures in order to avoid penalizing the employment of low-skilled workers. It indicates that the unemployment rate fell by 0.3 points in 2015 and 0.2 points in 2016. In the final quarter of 2016, unemployment affected 10 per cent of the workforce, not including the island of Mayotte. However, the Government reports negative economic consequences of a split between persons with stable employment and those in precarious employment or who are unemployed. The Committee notes the observations of the CGT–FO, which points out that the unemployment rate fell by 1.6 per cent, from 6,284,920 persons in December 2014 to 6,653,790 persons in December 2016. The CGT–FO asserts that, in 2015, including unemployment and hidden unemployment, 11.5 per cent of persons between 16 and 64 years of age were without employment and seeking employment throughout the country. It highlights a serious deterioration in the employment situation characterized by long-term unemployment, which has been increasing since 2008. Indeed, 42.6 per cent of unemployed persons report that they have been out of work for a year or more. The CGT–FO also reports a sharp increase in the number of jobseekers in part-time work: more than 2,105,000 persons in August 2017, while 89.3 per cent of persons who are involuntarily unemployed are seeking full-time employment. It also indicates an explosion in the number of very short contracts from 1.6 million in 2011 to 4 million since the year 2000. The Committee requests the Government to continue providing information on the current active labour market policy and its impact. It requests the Government to continue to evaluate the measures implemented, indicating their impact with regard to the creation of productive employment and combating unemployment and underemployment, and to indicate whether any other mechanism is envisaged to replace the “SME recruitment bonus”. The Committee requests the Government to provide statistics disaggregated by age and sex on employment trends.

Article 3. Participation of the social partners. The Government indicates that the Act of 5 March 2014 reforming vocational training updated the regional and national rules governing the vocational training system by allowing the State, the social partners and regional governments to establish new dialogue procedures. In that regard, at the national level, the National Council for Employment, Vocational Training and Guidance (CNEFOP) has replaced the National Employment Council and the National Council for Lifelong Vocational Training. The Government adds that this Council brings together the State, represented by 12 ministries including those responsible for employment and vocational training, national education, the regions, and the representative social partners at the national and interoccupational, multioccupational or other concerned levels, as well as the consular chambers and the leading operators. It indicates that the Council is a consultation body for all the legislative and regulatory texts in this area. It is also a body for dialogue, monitoring, coordination and evaluation of policies on employment and lifelong initial and continued vocational training and guidance. At the regional level, the Government indicates that the Regional Council for Employment, Vocational Training and Guidance (CREFOP) ensures coordination between stakeholders regarding vocational training and guidance and employment policies and the consistency of training programmes. It indicates that the Council brings together representatives of the State, the regions, the social partners and the public employment service. The Government adds that the Council promotes the formulation and implementation of a concerted regional strategy on vocational guidance, the development of alternance training and vocational training of employees and jobseekers, and that it conducts an evaluation of the actions taken. The Committee requests the Government to continue providing further examples of the participation of the social partners in the formulation of an active policy designed to promote full, productive and freely chosen employment. It also requests the Government to indicate the manner in which the consultations with the social partners held in the CNEFOP and the CREFOP have contributed to the formulation of employment policies and the manner in which their experience and views are fully taken into account when formulating such policies.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Greece

Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122) (ratification: 1984)

The Committee notes the observations of the Greek General Confederation of Labour (GSEE), received on 1 September 2017. The Committee requests the Government to provide its comments in this respect.

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Active employment policy and labour market measures implemented under the adjustment programme. Employment trends. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the persistent high levels of unemployment in Greece and requested the Government to report on the measures taken to address the situation. The Committee notes that the GSEE has been reiterating concerns since 2010 that the Government’s imposition of austerity measures as part of the implementation of the adjustment programmes has led to an extensive and arbitrary deregulation of the Greek labour market which has resulted in the violation of the provisions of the Convention. The GSEE stresses that no progress has been made with regard to the application of the Convention, as the legislative provisions which it considers to be incompatible with the Convention have not been modified or repealed. It further notes the high levels of unemployment as well as the deterioration of the living conditions of Greek people due to the economic recession. The GSEE maintains that the dramatic increase in unemployment in the country is related to three developments: (i) the dismantling of legislation on temporary employment which had the effect of deterring hirings; (ii) bankruptcies and layoffs; and (iii) new legislation that facilitated dismissals. The Committee notes that, according to the Government, the general unemployment rate decreased from 26.5 per cent in 2014 to 24.9 per cent in 2015. According to the ILOSTAT database, the overall unemployment rate was 21.5 per cent in 2017. The Committee notes that, despite the continued decrease, the unemployment rate remains high. The Committee further notes that the employment rate increased during the same period, from 49.6 per cent in 2014 to 51.3 per cent in 2015. The GSEE observes that Greece continues to have the lowest employment rate among the EU countries, noting that, in 2016, the employment rate stood at 56.2 per cent, compared with an EU average of 71.1 per cent. The GSEE maintains that the Government has not presented any specific examples of job creation and active employment policies, or of efforts made to encourage the unemployed to return to work. On the other hand, the Government reports a number of legislative developments and labour market reforms, in the framework of the third economic adjustment programme for Greece, which began on 19 August 2015 and ended on 20 August 2018. In this respect, the Government refers to the recommendations formulated in the updated Memorandum of Understanding on Specific Economic Policy Conditionalities (May 2013), according to which, during the 2014–20 period, accelerated efforts are required to prevent unemployment from becoming permanent, focusing on the integration of the long-term unemployed, disadvantaged persons and persons in greater need of income support, on easing labour market mismatches and facilitating the mobility of workers across occupations and sectors and strengthening the social economy.

The Committee notes that the active employment policies reported by the Government are primarily employment enhancement programmes implemented by the Greek Manpower Employment Organization (OAED). The Committee also notes that the programmes for the creation of new jobs and for acquisition of work experience constitute an important priority of the Ministry of Labour with regard to employment activation policy programmes, especially through community work programmes which focus on the long-term unemployed, subsidization of enterprises to encourage them to hire unemployed persons, education and training programmes in cutting edge sectors of the Greek economy and also subsidization of new freelance professionals. According to EUROSTAT, the part-time employment rate in Greece has shown an upward trend since 2012, reaching 9.4 per cent in 2013. This percentage is considerably higher among young persons compared to the population in general (23.1 per cent in 2015). The Committee notes that, in 2015, the risk of poverty for workers with full-time jobs was 11.6 per cent, while for workers with part-time jobs the risk rose to 28.2 per cent. It also notes that the rate of long-term unemployment remains high, reaching 73.2 per cent in 2015. With respect to measures taken for the compilation of statistics and other data concerning the size and distribution of the labour force, the Committee notes with interest the establishment in 2016 of a Mechanism to Identify Labour Market Needs. Taking into account the persistent high levels of unemployment in Greece, the Committee requests the Government to provide more... detailed information on how, pursuant to Article 2 of the Convention, it keeps under review the employment policies and measures adopted or undertaken to pursue the objectives of full, productive and freely chosen employment, in consultation with the social partners. It further requests the Government to include information on the measures taken or envisaged to address the national employment situation and to provide information, including statistical information disaggregated by sex and age, on the impact of employment initiatives adopted within the implementation of an active employment policy, including on the impact of the measures taken to promote the integration of the long-term unemployed in the labour market. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide statistical data disaggregated by sex and age concerning the size and distribution of the labour force, including the size of the informal economy and employment trends in relation to employment, unemployment, and visible underemployment.

Workers vulnerable to decent work deficits. The Committee notes the information provided by the Government concerning targeted employment measures for specific groups of persons vulnerable to decent work deficits. In this respect, the Government is implementing subsidy programmes to provide financial assistance to employers in order to encourage recruitment and job retention of unemployed people with disabilities, ex-addicts, ex-convicts, disadvantaged persons, and very disadvantaged persons. The Committee notes that disadvantaged persons are defined by the Government as those who during the last six months were not employed for more than one month in a full-time regularly paid job, graduates of compulsory education schools who have not completed secondary education, or have not attended any vocational training programmes, people over 50 years old, and leaders of single-parent families, while very disadvantaged persons are defined as those who are holders of a valid unemployment card for a period of at least 24 months, young delinquents or young people at social risk. The Committee requests the Government to provide updated information on the nature and impact of measures taken to promote full, productive, freely-chosen and sustainable employment for persons vulnerable to decent work deficits.

Youth employment. The Committee notes that youth unemployment rates have steadily decreased, but still remain alarmingly high. According to data from the Hellenic Statistical Authority (ELSTAT), the unemployment rate among young persons aged 15 to 24 decreased from 51.9 per cent in 2015 to 50.9 per cent in 2016. According to the ILOSTAT database, the youth unemployment rate was 43.6 per cent in 2017. The Government indicates that facilitating access to employment for young persons up to 29 years old is one of its priorities. The Committee notes the information provided by the Government in relation to a series of employment activation programmes, implemented in the framework of the Youth Guarantee scheme, which aim to increase the employability of young people, to enable them to be more competitive and facilitate their reintegration into the labour market. In this respect, the Committee notes, inter alia, the entry vouchers and apprenticeship programmes provided to young persons aged 15 to 24. It also notes the subsidy programmes for the acquisition of work experience and employment integration of young people and the training and accreditation programmes, implemented under the Youth Employment Initiative, established within the framework of the Youth Guarantee. The Government indicates that the “brain drain” phenomenon has become a matter of increasing concern given that, according to data from the Bank of Greece, from 2008 to 2013, almost 223,000 young persons aged 25 to 39 permanently left the country in search of better paid employment and better social and financial prospects in foreign labour markets. The Committee notes that, while the Government’s report provides detailed information concerning problems identified and intended actions, it does not contain information regarding the outcomes of specific programmes. Noting the persistent high levels of youth unemployment, the Committee requests the Government to provide detailed information on the results of the measures adopted to address youth unemployment as well as the challenges encountered. The Committee also requests the Government to continue to provide statistical information on trends in youth employment, disaggregated by gender and age. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on measures taken or envisaged with a view to reversing the “brain drain” phenomenon.

Older workers. The Committee notes that older workers are disadvantaged compared to other categories of workers, as the participation rate in the labour market for persons belonging to the age group 55 to 64 is considerably lower than the rate for persons aged 15 to 64. The Government indicates that the unemployment rate for older workers stood at 24.3 per cent in 2015. Women aged 55 to 64 had even higher unemployment rates (29.6 per cent in 2015). The Government refers to a number of measures to promote the employment of older persons, including the provision of financial support to employers in order to encourage them to employ older workers. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on other measures adopted to increase the employability of older workers and promote their integration and retention in the labour market, as well on their impact.

Women’s employment. The Committee notes that the unemployment rate for women continues to be higher than that for men. According to the ILOSTAT database, in 2017, the unemployment rate for women stood at 26.1 per cent, compared to 17.8 per cent for men, while the unemployment rate for young women was 48.2 per cent, compared to 39.3 per cent for young men. The Committee further notes that part-time employment is more widespread among women (13.1 per cent in 2015 compared to 6.7 per cent among men). The Government emphasizes that strengthening female employment constitutes a priority axis of its new National Action Plan for Gender Equality 2016–20. The Committee notes the information provided by the Government regarding the project “Supporting Female Employment by Fostering Entrepreneurship” which seeks to offer multiple employment opportunities to women and assistance to enable them to set up their own businesses. The Committee also notes the subsidy programme to support new freelance professionals, especially women. Recalling the 2003 ILO Global Report Time for equality at work, which points out that the “interplay of identities results in experiences of exclusion and disadvantage that are unique to those with multiple identities”, the Committee observes that women who also belong to disadvantaged groups face double discrimination. Noting the higher rates of unemployment for women, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the nature and impact of measures adopted with a view to promoting the employment of women, particularly women who belong to disadvantaged groups or older female workers, as noted above, to enable them to access decent and lasting employment at all levels and across all economic sectors.

Education and training policies and programmes. The Government indicates that upgrading and expanding vocational education and training is among its key priorities. The Committee notes the conclusion of the “National Strategic Framework for the upgrade of vocational education and training and apprenticeships”. The Government refers to a series of actions implemented by the OAED in the context of vocational training, including the operation of 51 occupational schools of secondary education offering apprenticeships, the provision of vouchers to improve the labour market relevance of tertiary education for the unemployed, training vouchers, labour market entry vouchers and reintegration vouchers for unemployed people, especially for young people. The Committee also notes that the employment programmes implemented in the context of the Operational Programme “Human Resources Development, Education and Life-Long Learning 2014-2020”, focus on the design and implementation of programmes to upgrade human resources knowledge and skills especially for persons with low qualifications seeking to enter or reintegrate into the labour market. The Government indicates that the Mechanism to Identify Labour Market Needs aims to improve the links between education and training and labour market needs. It provides input to the bodies responsible for designing and implementing employment and training programmes to eliminate skills mismatches. The Committee requests the Government to provide updated information on the number of persons participating in educational and training programmes and the impact of these programmes on productive and lasting employment opportunities for young people. It also requests the Government to provide information on the impact of the Mechanism to Identify Labour Market Needs on the design of policies on vocational education and training and human resources development.

Promotion of small and medium-sized enterprises (SMEs). Entrepreneurships. The Committee notes the information provided by the Government on the measures to promote SMEs, in the context of the Operational Programme “Competitiveness and Entrepreneurship of the National Strategic Reference Framework 2007-2013”. The Government refers to the establishment of the social entrepreneurship and social economy, the creation of the policy-coordinating body for the development of social economy, as well as the establishment of the social Entrepreneurship Fund and the Central Support Mechanism for the Development and Promotion of Social Enterprises. The Government indicates that the necessary framework shall be finalized for the promotion of social economy, during the programming period 2014–20 and in accordance with the “Strategic Plan for the Development of Social Entrepreneurship”. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken to improve the business environment with a view to supporting the development of SMEs and creating employment opportunities for the unemployed. It also requests the Government to provide information on the finalized framework for the promotion of the social economy. Referring to the Promotion of Cooperatives Recommendation, 2002 (No. 193), it requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken to promote productive employment through cooperatives.

Modernization of labour market institutions. The Government indicates that, during the 2007–13 period, the OAED began to redefine its operational model, aiming at the overall reform of the Public Employment Service. The Committee notes, among other achievements of the reform, the operation of the first fast-track Employment Promotion Centres and the creation of the first consortiums with social agents, manpower companies and large companies for the training of jobseekers. The Government indicates that, during the 2014–20 period, actions concerning the OAED reorganization were to be financed, on the basis of the agreed Action Plan with the European Union. It adds that it will provide more detailed information concerning the effectiveness of the reorganization of the labour market institutions in its next report. Referring to its 2016 direct request on the Employment Service Convention, 1948 (No. 88), the Committee requests the Government to provide further information on the effectiveness of the reorganization of its labour market institutions.

Article 3. Participation of the social partners. The Government indicates that the Mechanism to Identify Labour Market Needs operates in continuous consultation with representatives of productive bodies and public organizations. In this respect, the Committee notes that, five of the signatories to the National General Labour Collective Agreement participate in the Coordination Committee and the Operational Network of Bodies for the Mechanism to Identify Labour Market Needs. It also notes that the social partners, in the context of the Mechanism, carried out an employer and employee survey throughout the country in order to assess vacant posts and the adequacy of the skills of the labour force, with a view to identifying mismatches between occupations and skills. The GSEE maintains that tripartite dialogue processes remain superficial and have not been restored in practice adding that successive legislative interventions were undertaken with no regard for social dialogue. It also notes that, in November 2015, all the national social partners agreed on a joint policy paper on “Strengthening the effectiveness of tripartite social dialogue”, which was sent along with the joint policy papers on “Social dialogue and vocational education and training issues” and “Social dialogue and discrimination at the workplace” to the Ministry of Labour, but were never taken into consideration. The GSEE also expresses its concern regarding its exclusion from the National Vocational Education and Training Committee, which was established in 2017. The GSEE highlights the processes relating to technical assistance programmes under the auspices of ILO, especially the undeclared work programme, where the presence of the ILO officials and the consistent monitoring of the procedure ensured the participation of social partners in tripartite social dialogue procedures. The Committee reiterates its request that the Government provide specific information on the manner in which representative organizations of workers and employers and other stakeholders are consulted concerning the formulation and implementation of active employment policies, and the manner in which their support is ensured in the development and implementation of such policies.

Libya

Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122) (ratification: 1971)

Follow-up to the conclusions of the Committee on the Application of Standards (International Labour Conference, 107th Session, May–June 2018)

The Committee recalls the discussion that took place in the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards (CAS) at its 107th Session in May–June 2018 concerning the application of the Convention. Acknowledging the complexity of the situation prevailing on the ground and the presence of armed conflict, the CAS highlighted the impact and consequences of conflicts on poverty and development, decent work and sustainable enterprises, and recognized the importance of employment and decent work for promoting peace, enabling recovery and building resilience. Taking into account the Government’s submission and the discussion, the Committee requested the Government to provide information regarding updated statistics on the labour market, disaggregated by sex and age; information on the labour market strategy and the way in which employment objectives are to be achieved; information on progress made in the compilation and analysis of labour market data; and information on measures to promote the establishment and development of small and medium-sized enterprises (SMEs) as well as measures introduced to increase the participation in the labour market of persons in vulnerable situations. The CAS urged the Government to submit a detailed report to the Committee of Experts at its November 2018 session. It also urged the Government to avail itself of ILO technical assistance to adopt and implement without delay an active policy designed to promote full, productive and freely chosen employment, in consultation with the social partners. The CAS called on the ILO, the international community and employers’ and workers’ organizations to collaborate with the goal of reinforcing the labour administration system in Libya so that full, productive and freely chosen employment could become a reality in the country as soon as possible.

Articles 1, 2 and 3 of the Convention. Implementation of an active employment policy. Consultations with the social partners. The Committee welcomes the information provided in the Government’s report. In respect of the national labour market strategy and the means for achieving the objectives of the Convention, the Government indicates that the Libyan National Strategy for Human Development and Empowerment for 2013–2014 (the Strategy) focused on: transformational training for graduates whose qualifications do not meet labour market requirements; promotion of self-sufficiency through the creation of SMEs; and the establishment of a comprehensive human resources and employment database to identify human resource requirements. The Strategy also specifies six key strategic objectives in relation to training and the workforce, which are to: increase the rate of full and decent employment for all those able to work; address the problems of seasonal and underemployment and consider enforcing the social security law to avoid criminal behaviour that could result from an interruption of income; emphasize vocational guidance and counselling for new entrants to the labour market and expand the participation of the private sector in vocational and technical training; increase the number of seminars and studies on human resources and enabling participation in these at home and abroad, as well as reviewing recruitment policies, activities and procedures and develop legislation in response to globalization; promote women’s empowerment and capacity building; change stereotypes with respect to women’s work; restructure the labour market to respond to requirements in the area of globalization and information technology; and develop methods and mechanisms of training and occupational and technical rehabilitation which respond to the introduction of advanced methods in the field of training, including continued distance training, transformational training and other training modalities. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on progress made in the implementation of the Libyan National Strategy for Human Development and Empowerment for 2013–14 and on its impact in terms of promoting full, productive, freely chosen and sustainable employment opportunities, as contemplated in Article 1 of the Convention.

Article 2. Employment trends. Labour market information. The Government reports that the Documentation and Information Centre of the Ministry of Labour and Rehabilitation launched a system for gathering data on the labour force in the public and private sectors, as well as data on jobseekers. According to the report, the total number of people in employment in both the public and private sectors is 1,827,692, out of which 738,608 are women, and 1,089,084 are men. The data also indicates that 170,643 of the employed population are in the 18 to 25 age bracket and 1,657,049 are over 25. It further notes that, according to the adjusted data, in 2017, the number of jobseekers reached a total of 205,000 persons. The Committee notes, however, that the Government provides no information on the year for which this information is applicable. The Government indicates that the Ministry’s centres and affiliated institutes (such as the Libyan-Korean Institute affiliated to the Ministry of Labour) provide training to registered jobseekers and graduates in several fields. It adds that as a result, several trainees have found employment either in the National Oil Corporation, and others in the private sector. The Government further reports that the Libyan multi-purpose survey project for the period 2017–18 has been implemented and that its results will be used to inform the development of an employment policy, in collaboration with the social partners. It adds that in mid-August 2018, a technical delegation from the International Labour Organization (ILO) visited Libya to discuss with the Minister of Labour the establishment of an ILO representation office in Tripoli, which would support comprehensive cooperation between the Ministry of Labour and the ILO to achieve common goals, especially on the topics of: restructuring; the digital Government; archiving and the development of the public sector; illegal migration; and rehabilitation and training programmes. The Committee requests the Government to provide detailed updated information on the impact of measures taken to improve the labour market information system. It also requests the Government to indicate the manner in which the labour market information obtained is used, in collaboration with the social partners, for the formulation, implementation, evaluation and modification of active labour market measures. The Committee further requests the Government to provide updated statistics, disaggregated by sex and age, concerning the size and distribution of the labour force, the type and extent of employment, unemployment and underemployment.

Promotion of SMEs. The Government indicates that the National Programme for Small and Medium-sized enterprises was established to promote a culture of innovation and create a supportive environment for SMEs. In October 2017, the National Reconciliation Government launched a pilot programme to finance SMEs, with the aim of providing job opportunities to youth and reducing unemployment. The programme was intended to provide financial loans to entrepreneurs through commercial banks backed with guarantees from the Lending Guarantee Fund. In addition, business incubators were to be set up throughout the country to provide assistance for projects and to train those responsible for the projects and assist them in preparing their workplans. Commercial banks would undertake to finance up to 60 per cent of the project’s cost, provided that supporting project funds contributed 30 per cent of the total value of the project and the beneficiary of the project paid 10 per cent of the remaining cost. The Committee notes that ten business incubators were launched at Libyan universities to provide and support graduate students in cooperation with the Libyan Oil Corporation, to open centres in fields such as Jallow and Uppari to train young people and help them finance their own projects. It further notes that, in cooperation with international organizations such as Expertise France, several boot camps were held in Tunis to train young entrepreneurs and assist them in setting up projects. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide detailed updated information on the impact of the measures taken to generate employment through the promotion of SMEs and entrepreneurship opportunities.

Employment of women. The Government indicates that the Presidential Council of the National Reconciliation Government has attached particular importance to the rights of women and persons with special needs to work without neglecting the rights to education, health, development and other rights that respect the religious and cultural identity of the Libyan people. In this regard, the Council issued Resolution No. 210 of 2016 establishing a support and empowerment unit for women employed in state institutions. The Committee also notes that Law No. 2 of 2018 issued by the Presidential Council provides for the implementation of the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women, ratified on 16 May 1989. The Committee requests the Government to provide detailed information, including updated statistical data, disaggregated by age, sex and economic sector or occupation, on the impact of labour market measures taken to increase the labour force participation rate of women, including in managerial and decision-making positions across all economic sectors.

Persons with disabilities. The Government reports that a special programme has been created for people with disabilities, including young persons with disabilities due to the conflict. The Committee notes that, in 2009, the number of people with disabilities in Libya was 70,721, out of which 3,879 hold postgraduate or university degrees, while 14,525 are illiterate and 13,159 are unable to learn. In this regard, the Government indicates that the General Authority of Families of Martyrs, Amputees and Missing Persons (the “Authority”), in collaboration with the National Programme for Small and Medium Enterprises, established a special programme for entrepreneurs, known as “Ademeni” (Support Me). The programme aims to improve the working capacity of people with disabilities and to prepare them for employment. The programme focuses, among other things, on education and training, including in information technology, needs assessments, capacity building, support and training of non-governmental organizations and employment services, raising companies’ awareness of the benefits of employing persons with disabilities, and promoting entrepreneurship for persons with disabilities who wish to start private businesses. The Committee notes that the Presidential Council has issued Publication No. 2 of 2018 to implement the provisions of the International Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities, ratified by Libya on 13 February 2018. The role of the Presidential Council, in this regard, is to promote the access of persons with disabilities to employment opportunities guaranteed to them by the legislation. In this context, the Government indicates that ministries, public institutions, bodies and companies are required to comply with the legislation in force. The Committee notes that Law No. 3 of 1981 and Law No. 5 of 1987 (on persons with disabilities) stipulate that persons with disabilities should be provided with “a suitable job” and that administrative units, companies and public facilities are required to hire a certain proportion of persons with disabilities. On 3 May 2012, the Minister of Labour and Capacity Building introduced a 5 per cent quota for persons with disabilities in state administrative jobs. The Committee requests the Government to provide updated detailed information on the impact of active employment measures taken to promote the employment of persons with both mental and physical disabilities. It further requests the Government to provide updated statistics disaggregated by age and sex, indicating the number of persons with disabilities employed in the public and private sectors.
Migrant workers. The Government reports that migrants in an irregular situation were reluctant to regularize their situation through registration, due to their fear of being repatriated and their desire to migrate to Europe through the country as one of the transit States south of the Mediterranean. The Committee notes that, in cooperation with neighbouring countries, countries of origin and relevant international organizations, the Government has made significant and positive progress in reducing irregular migration, urging migrants to obtain legal status in the country to enjoy rights guaranteed by law for voluntary employment or voluntary repatriation. The Committee requests the Government to provide updated detailed information on measures taken or envisaged to implement the recommendations of the Committee on the Application of Standards in relation to migrant workers.

Nigeria

Employment Service Convention, 1948 (No. 88) (ratification: 1961)

Articles 1 and 3 of the Convention. Contribution of the employment service to employment promotion. The Committee notes with interest the adoption of the revised National Employment Policy (NEP) on 19 July 2017, which provides for a range of improvements to the employment service system. In particular, the Committee welcomes section 4.7.6 of the NEP, in which the Government undertakes to improve the collection, processing and analysis of employment statistics and other labour market information for purposes, inter alia, of improved employment and social development planning, and with the objective of establishing and maintaining functional and timely information regarding job vacancies, sectoral changes, geographical imbalances and other labour and income trends. The Committee further notes that, pursuant to section 4.7.7 of the NEP, the Government, through the Federal Ministry of Labour and Employment (FMLE), is to establish a minimum of two community employment centres (CECs) in all 744 local government areas in the country. The CECs are to provide a full range of employment services to jobseekers in rural and urban communities in the country, including training, referrals, career counselling and information on job vacancies. The Committee requests the Government to provide detailed information on the measures taken or envisaged to implement the provisions of the NEP and its accompanying employment matrix, relating to the structure and functioning of the employment service. The Committee also requests the Government to provide updated information, including statistical information disaggregated by age and sex, on the number and location of public employment offices, including the CECs established in the different areas of the country, the number of new staff recruited, the number of applications for employment received, the number of vacancies notified and the number of persons placed in employment by such offices. The Government is requested to indicate the manner in which the employment service, in collaboration with other public and private bodies concerned, ensures the best possible organization of the labour market with a view to the achievement and maintenance of full, productive and freely chosen employment.

Articles 4 and 5. Consultations with the social partners. The Committee notes the Government’s indication that the social partners, along with other stakeholders, participated in the review and validation of the revised NEP and its accompanying implementation matrix prior to its adoption by the Federal Executive Council in July 2017. The Committee requests the Government to indicate the measures taken or envisaged to give effect to the provisions of Article 4, which requires arrangements to be made through one or more national advisory committees and where necessary regional and local committees for the cooperation of the social partners in the organization and operation of the employment service and the development of related policy. In this context, and referring once again to its previous comments, the Committee reiterates its request that the Government provide information on consultations held in the National Labour Advisory Board on the organization and operation of the employment exchanges and professional and executive registries, as well as on the development and implementation of employment service policies and programmes.

Article 6. Organization of the employment service. The Government reports that some of the employment exchanges and the professional and executive registries in Nigeria have been upgraded to model job centres. It adds that the services provided by the exchanges have been upgraded and their facilities computerized, enabling them to replace manual registration of jobseekers with an electronic platform linked to the National Electronic Labour Exchange (NELEX), enabling jobseekers and employers to meet online and access employment services. The Committee requests the Government to provide updated detailed information, including statistical information on the impact of reorganization and restructuring of the employment services under the revised NEP. The Committee further requests the Government to provide up-to-date information on the operation of the job centres and their contribution towards meeting the needs of employers and workers, particularly in those regions of the country with high levels of unemployment. The Government is also requested to provide updated information in its next report on progress made regarding the establishment of CECs in all 744 local government areas of the country, as called for under the NEP, as well as on other measures taken or envisaged to respond to the needs of employers and workers in all geographical regions of the country.

Article 7. Particular categories of jobseekers. The Committee welcomes the provisions in sections 4.7.3 and 4.7.4 in the revised NEP, in which the Government undertakes to develop and implement a range of measures to ensure the greater participation of women in the workforce and the full employability of persons with disabilities, respectively. In respect of the employment of women, the Committee notes that the federal and state Governments are to develop self-employment promotion programmes for women, especially in rural communities, and the Federal Ministry of Women’s Affairs and Social Development, together with related state ministries and local government councils, shall establish mentorship programmes and gender-specific career counselling in the 744 local government areas (NEP, section 4.7.3). In relation to the employment of persons with disabilities, section 4.7.4 of the NEP provides, inter alia, that the Government will facilitate the passage of a draft law on persons with disabilities and establish vocational rehabilitation centres to develop and enhance the skills and potential of persons with disabilities. The Committee requests the Government to provide comprehensive updated information on measures taken to promote women’s employment, particularly in rural communities, including information on the mentorship and gender-specific career counselling services provided in the local government areas, specifying the involvement of the employment service in this respect. The Committee further requests the Government to provide detailed information on measures taken or envisaged to give full effect to the provisions of section 7.7.4 of the NEP, including providing a copy of the law on persons with disabilities once it is adopted. The Committee recalls that the Government may avail itself of technical assistance with regard to the achievement of these objectives.

Article 8. Employment of young persons. The Committee notes the focus in section 4.7.1 of the NEP on job creation for young persons, particularly in the agricultural sector. In particular, the Government contemplates providing temporary employment for 500,000 graduates annually in the areas of education, agriculture, health and taxes. Referring once again to its previous comments, the Committee requests the Government to provide detailed information on the impact of the measures taken by the employment service to assist young persons in securing suitable employment, as well as information on the impact of measures taken by the National Directorate of Employment and the National Poverty Eradication Programme in this respect. The Government is also requested to provide information on the specific measures taken to implement the provisions of the NEP on youth entrepreneurship – including training and facilitating access to credit, insurance and other financial services – and skills acquisition for unemployed youth. It further requests the Government to provide information on the specific services and activities offered by the employment service in relation to the achievement of the objectives set out in section 4.7.1 of the NEP of generating employment opportunities and promoting skills acquisition for young persons.

Article 10. Measures to encourage the full use of employment service facilities. The Government indicates that private employment agencies (PEAs) are encouraged to advertise all job vacancies on the NELEX platform. In addition, it envisages taking steps to raise public awareness of the activities of the employment exchanges and the NELEX platform. The Committee reiterates its previous request that the Government provide detailed information on the measures taken or envisaged by the employment services, with the cooperation of the social partners, to encourage the full use of employment service facilities. The Government is requested to provide specific examples of activities conducted to reach out to the local workforce in various geographical regions of the country.

Article 11. Cooperation between public and private employment agencies not conducted with a view to profit. The Committee notes the provisions of the NEP concerning the regulation of the activities of PEAs operating in the country. In particular, the Government, through the FMLE, undertakes to ensure adequate protection for the workers placed by such agencies. The Government reports that annual capacity-building workshops carried out with PEAs have strengthened existing cooperation between the employment service and PEAs. It adds that the workshops have resulted in improved compliance by PEAs with statutory provisions and have raised their awareness of decent work principles. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide updated information on the measures taken or envisaged to ensure effective cooperation between the public employment service and PEAs not conducted with a view to profit, including information on the content and outcome of the annual capacity building workshops for such agencies.

Panama

Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122) (ratification: 1970)

The Committee notes the observations of the National Confederation of United Independent Unions (CONUSI), received on 31 August 2018. The Committee requests the Government to provide its comments in this respect.

Articles 1, 2 and 3 of the Convention. Implementation of an active employment policy. Participation of the social partners. The Committee notes with interest the series of measures adopted by the Government in collaboration with the social partners to achieve the objectives established in the Convention. The Government refers to the adoption, on 30 March 2017, of the National Strategic Plan with the “Panama 2030” State Vision, achieved through the active participation of stakeholders such as the National Council of Organized Workers (CONATO) and the National Council of Private Enterprise (CONEPC). The Plan brings the Government Strategic Plan 2015–19 and the priorities of the National Development Dialogue (CND) into line with the United Nations Sustainable Development Goals (SDGs). Its objectives include inclusive and sustainable growth, full and productive employment, and decent work for all, as well as the promotion of inclusive and equitable quality education. Furthermore, in December 2016, a cooperation and technical assistance agreement was signed between the ILO and the Ministry of Labour, with the aim of implementing the recommendations of the High Commission on Employment, in particular, strengthening the technical training system in Panama and guaranteeing better quality and more informed labour market access, thus creating skilled and sustainable employment. In this regard, the action plan on technical education and vocational training entitled the “Preparing Panama Programme” was established with a view to accelerating the implementation of the initiatives required to address the causes of the growing skills gap in the country’s labour market. The Programme is based on two interlinked lines of action (employment and training), in which employers’ and workers’ organizations are participating. The priorities of the action plan for this Programme include the linking of education and vocational training, the establishment of a national qualifications framework, and the identification and dissemination of trends and skills requirements in the labour market. In this regard, the Government refers to the creation, with the participation of the social partners, of the Labour Market Intelligence Unit (UNIMEL), to provide up-to-date, timely and relevant information on the situation in the labour market in Panama, with a view to designing, monitoring and improving employment policies. With reference to labour market trends, the Committee observes that, according to the Labour Market Survey of the National Statistical and Census Institute (INEC), between August 2016 and August 2017, the number of people in employment aged over 15 years increased from 1,770,711 to 1,785,849, while the unemployment rate increased from 5.5 per cent to 6.1 per cent. CONUSI maintains that the statistical information on the labour market was scattered and did not allow for an accurate evaluation of the impact of the measures adopted to promote employment. In this regard, the Committee observes that the Government does not provide any up-to-date statistical information on the employment situation in the informal economy. Lastly, the Committee notes the detailed information provided by the Government on the consultations held with the social partners on employment and technical training. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the impact of the measures adopted to achieve the objectives of the Convention, including those adopted under the National Strategic Plan with the “Panama 2030” State Vision, and the action plan on technical education and vocational training entitled the “Preparing Panama Programme”. The Committee also requests the Government to continue to provide up-to-date statistical information on developments in the labour market, particularly the rates of labour force participation, employment, unemployment and underemployment, in both the formal and informal economy, disaggregated by sex and age. The Committee also requests the Government to continue to provide information on the consultations held with the social partners on the matters covered by the Convention.

Peru

Vocational Rehabilitation and Employment (Disabled Persons) Convention, 1983 (No. 159) (ratification: 1986)

The Committee notes the observations of the Autonomous Workers’ Confederation of Peru (CATP), received on 2 September 2018. The Committee also notes the Government’s replies to the observations of the CATP in 2017 and 2018, received on 9 February and 30 October 2018, respectively.

Articles 2 and 3 of the Convention. Implementation of vocational rehabilitation and employment policies for persons with disabilities. In reply to its previous comments, the Committee notes the Government’s reference to the preparation of the National Policy on the Promotion of Employment Opportunities for Persons with Disabilities by the Ministry of Labour and Employment Promotion (MTPE), which is to be adopted following the incorporation into the text of comments and contributions by the persons concerned. A general national policy on disability is also to be developed and will cover various areas, such as health, education and labour. The Committee also notes the implementation of a joint programme on employment and disability with a focus on gender, with the participation of the ILO, the United Nations Population Fund (UNFPA) and the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO), as well as the MTPE and the National Council for the Integration of Persons with Disabilities (CONADIS) of the Ministry of Women and Vulnerable Populations (MIMP). This programme aims to improve access for persons with disabilities to decent employment opportunities and to raise awareness of the skills of these persons and their potential to contribute to the productive life and development of their communities and the country. The joint programme will contribute to the improvement of employment access for persons with disabilities, by strengthening public administration at the local level and highlighting the particularly vulnerable situation of women with disabilities. With regard to the adoption of measures to encourage compliance with the 5 per cent quota for the recruitment of persons with disabilities in the public sector, the Government indicates that a number of proposals have been submitted to amend the regulations of Act No. 29973 in order to facilitate the fulfilment of this quota, but that these proposals have not yet been approved. The proposals concern, inter alia, the establishment of a specific procedure to follow if the public authorities do not meet the recruitment quota. The Government indicates that, according to the report entitled “Achieving the Labour Integration of Persons with Disabilities in the Peruvian Civil Service”, published by the National Civil Service Authority (SERVIR) in October 2015, the low level of education of most persons with disabilities (only 12 per cent of whom completed higher education) prevents them from meeting the requirements for public employment. In this regard, the Government indicates that, in 2017, a working group comprising SERVIR and CONADIS was set up with the aim of putting forward proposals to change public policy so as to ensure the genuine inclusion of persons with disabilities and encourage public institutions to seek professional and competent workers among this population. Furthermore, under the National Human Rights Plan 2017–21, training and awareness-raising activities are to be carried out for public servants in relation to the labour aspect of the rights of persons with disabilities. The Plan also provides for the development of a study on the implementation of reasonable accommodations, with the aim of promoting the access of persons with disabilities to national Government bodies, by generating adequate information and establishing specific mechanisms to assess candidates with disabilities without discrimination and in accordance with the principle of equality of opportunity. Lastly, the Government indicates that, pursuant to section 49(3) of Act No. 29973, SERVIR is responsible for verifying compliance with the quota for the recruitment of persons with disabilities, in coordination with CONADIS. As regards private sector enterprises with 50 workers or more, the Government indicates that the National Employment Service (SNE) is the competent body responsible for overseeing the regulations governing compliance with the 3 per cent recruitment quota established for the private sector. The Government indicates that the failure of private employers to meet the labour quota after two years from the entry into force of the above Act will lead to the application of the penalties established in Act No. 28806 (General Labour Inspection Act). The Government indicates that, with the aim of encouraging compliance with this quota, SUNAFIL has developed a tool enabling employers to establish whether their enterprise meets the quota. The Committee also notes the statistical information provided by the Government on the inspections carried out in the private sector with regard to compliance with the quota for the recruitment of persons with disabilities, and the results of these inspections. According to the Computerized Labour Inspection System (SIIT), in 2017, 488 inspection orders were completed in this regard. The Committee also notes the promulgation of Decree No. 1417 which amends, inter alia, section 50 of Act No. 29973. Pursuant to this section, employers in the public and private sectors are required to make reasonable accommodations, unless they demonstrate that such accommodations would impose an undue or disproportionate burden, in accordance with the criteria established by the MTPE. These accommodations must be made for persons with disabilities both in the selection process and in the workplace. This section also provides that employers shall receive advice and guidance in order to make reasonable accommodations for persons with disabilities in the workplace. The Committee also notes the information provided by the Government on the participation of persons with disabilities in the various employment programmes implemented, such as the Jóvenes Productivos programme, the Impulsa Perú programme and the Perú Responsable programme, and on the labour intermediation services provided for persons with disabilities by the National Employment Service (SNE).

In its observations, the CATP maintains that the measures adopted with a view to promoting labour market access for persons with disabilities are insufficient due to a lack of funding for these measures and of enforcement of the current legislation on the employment of persons with disabilities. It highlights that only two out of three persons with disabilities have completed or benefited from primary education, which makes their integration into the labour market even more difficult. Consequently, the CATP states that it is necessary to carry out joint action with the Ministry of Education in order to build the capacities of persons with disabilities. The CATP indicates that, while the general activity rate of the working age population is 74 per cent, for persons with disabilities the rate is only 22 per cent. It indicates that the majority of workers with disabilities are employed in the informal economy in temporary, precarious and low-paid jobs with high turnover rates. It reiterates that the rate of unemployment for persons with disabilities (12.1 per cent) is four times higher than the rate for the total population (3.7 per cent). The CATP states that it is necessary to examine the different types of disability and their impact on employability, and to simplify the administrative procedures required for persons with disabilities to gain recognition of their status and benefit from the measures to increase their employability and labour market access. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide updated information on the status of the adoption of proposals to amend Act No. 29973 with a view to promoting the employment of persons with disabilities and encouraging compliance with the quota for the recruitment of such persons in the public sector. The Committee also requests the Government to continue to provide updated information on the impact of the measures adopted to promote employment opportunities for persons with disabilities, including persons with mental or intellectual disabilities, in the open labour market in both the public and private sectors. The Committee also once again requests the Government to provide summaries of studies and evaluations of the policies and programmes on the rehabilitation and employment of persons with disabilities, and other updated indicators of the results achieved by the legislative measures and policies adopted in favour of persons with disabilities.

Article 5. Consultations with representative employers’ and workers’ organizations. In reply to the Committee’s previous comments, the Government indicates that, pursuant to section 14 of Act No. 29973, organizations representing persons with disabilities are consulted prior to the adoption of standards, policies and programmes on issues relating to disability, to enable them to make observations and contributions. The Government adds that such consultations include the formulation, implementation and review of all public policies relating to the rights of persons with disabilities. For example, the Government refers to the active participation of organizations of and for persons with disabilities in the formulation of the National Accessibility Plan. The Government indicates that, between 2016 and 2017, technical consultations and meetings were held with organizations of and for persons with disabilities, employers’ associations and public and private institutions, with a view to putting forward a proposal for a national policy to promote employment opportunities for persons with disabilities. Furthermore, in its reply to the CATP’s observations, the Government indicates that, between February and May 2016, tripartite consultations were held in the context of formulating public policies on telework related to persons with disabilities and their access to employment. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide detailed and updated information on the manner in which representative employers’ and workers’ organizations and representative organizations of and for persons with disabilities are consulted on the application and periodical review of the national policy on vocational rehabilitation for persons with disabilities.
Poland

Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122) (ratification: 1966)

The Committee notes the observations of the All-Poland Trade Unions Alliance (OPZZ), received on 31 August 2018, as well as the observations of the Independent and Self-Governing Trade Union “Solidarność”, received together with the Government’s report. The Committee also notes the Government’s reply to these observations, received on 22 October 2018.

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Active employment policy and labour market measures. The Government refers in its report to a number of legislative amendments, including a series of amendments to the 2004 Act on the promotion of employment and labour market institutions (“the 2004 Act”). The Committee also notes the measures taken by the Government in its continuing efforts to improve the labour market situation, including targeted measures to promote employment for specific groups, such as young persons, older workers and the long-term unemployed. The Committee notes the measures taken through the adoption of the Act of 22 June 2017, amending certain acts in connection with the “For Life” programme to facilitate access to employment for persons caring for persons with disabilities. It notes, however, that no information is provided regarding measures taken or envisaged to promote access to vocational rehabilitation and employment on the open labour market for persons with disabilities themselves. The Government also refers to improvements made by the Ministry of Family, Labour and Social Policy to the Central Database of Job Offers. In its observations, while Solidarność recognizes the improved implementation of the policy to promote full and effective employment, it nevertheless stresses the need for faster and more effective legislative action. Solidarność also maintains that more financial resources should be allocated from the Labour Fund towards the professional activation of the long-term unemployed. In its reply, the Government reports that 67,997.2 Polish zloty (PLN) were allocated from the Labour Fund for the implementation of activation programmes for the long-term unemployed in 2018. Solidarność also refers to abuses in relation to self-employment, civil law contracts and fixed-term employment contracts. In its reply, the Government reports that the proportion of vacancies to be filled under civil law contracts in 2015–17 out of the total number of job vacancies remained stable at between 29 to 34 per cent. It adds that, in 2017, a 3 per cent decrease in this type of contract was observed. The Committee notes that civil law contracts which do not provide for certain employment benefits and offer less occupational safety and health protection than employment contracts could constitute an abusive practice. Solidarność further indicates that the Parliament is preparing a new Act, the Labour Market Act, to replace the 2004 Act. It expresses concern that the draft Act proposes the deletion of a number of employment activation measures, including profiling assistance for every unemployed person, employment vouchers, as well as the Activation and Integration Programme (PAI), which targets the most disadvantaged persons in the labour market. The Government, in its reply, indicates that these solutions were abandoned as they were unsuccessful or inflexible in practice, and therefore, new forms of employment support and job creation are being proposed in the draft Labour Market Act. The Government refers to the National Training Fund (NTF), which was established in 2014, in the framework of the “Europe 2020” Strategy, to support investment in human resources. It adds that, in 2017, NTF funds were used by public employment services (PES) to support 5,000 employers and over 100,000 employees. Solidarność recognizes that the NTF’s scope of activities has been extended and now enables greater engagement of the social partners. Responding to the Committee’s request for information regarding measures taken to facilitate workers’ transition from temporary to permanent employment, the Government indicates that the Act of 7 April 2017 amending the Act on hiring temporary workers and certain other acts, introduced changes aiming to support the transition to permanent employment by imposing limits for temporary work arrangements, as well as penalties for temporary work agencies and user enterprises who violate these limits. Solidarność, on the other hand, expresses concern that current policies facilitate the activities of employment agencies, including temporary work agencies, often leading to situations where these entities are unprepared organizationally and lack the appropriate competencies. Solidarność therefore stresses the importance of adopting legislative changes to promote the strict regulation, supervision and control of the operations of such agencies. In its response, the Government indicates that the National Labour Inspectorate supervises the operation of private employment agencies (PEAs) in accordance with the conditions set out in the 2004 Act, which also introduced two types of certificates entitling PEAs to provide: (a) job placement services and counselling; and (b) temporary work services. It also reports that protection of the rights of employees of temporary employment agencies is provided by the 2004 Act and the Act on the Protection of Employee Claims. The Committee notes that, in the second quarter of 2018, three temporary work agencies were removed from the employment agency register because they were in arrears with payment of their social insurance premiums. The Committee requests the Government to provide updated detailed information on the impact of its national employment policy, including of the measures taken to promote the integration of the long-term unemployed in the labour market. Recalling its 2012 comments, the Committee also requests the Government to provide information regarding the nature and impact of measures taken or envisaged to promote the employment of persons with disabilities and other disadvantaged groups, including those in rural areas and in the undeclared economy. Referring to its 2016 comments on the Private Employment Agencies Convention, 1997 (No. 181), notably regarding the use of civil law contracts instead of the appropriate employment contracts, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken to regulate and supervise the operation of employment agencies and prevent abuses of workers in this respect (Article 1(1)(b) of Convention No. 181). It also requests the Government to communicate a copy of the new Labour Market Act once it has been adopted. Moreover, noting the proposed deletion of a number of employment activation measures, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the reasons for the suppression of these measures and to provide information on alternative employment activation measures taken or envisaged.

Article 2. Employment trends. The Government reports that the labour market situation continued to improve during the reporting period, which it attributes to a favourable economic situation and labour office activities. The Committee notes that the employment rate for persons aged 15–64 increased from 62.9 per cent in 2015 to 66.1 per cent in 2017, while the unemployment rate decreased from 7.6 per cent in 2015 to 5 per cent in 2017. The registered unemployment rate fell from 9.7 per cent in 2015 to 6.6 per cent in 2017. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide detailed information, including updated statistics, disaggregated by gender and age, on the situation and trends of the labour market in the country, including information on employment, unemployment and visible sub-employment.

Older workers. The Committee notes that the percentage of persons aged 45 and older among the registered unemployed increased from 32 per cent in 2013 to 36 per cent in 2017. The Government refers to a number of measures provided by PES to promote the employment of older persons, including the provision of financial support and encourage employers to recruit older workers. The Committee further notes the support provided to this group of workers through training courses and internships. The Government indicates that, in 2017, the Labour Fund allocated PLN458,752.5 to support the activation of persons aged 50+, with persons aged 45+ constituting the largest group among both employers and employees that benefited from the activities financed from the NTF. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on the impact of the measures adopted to increase the employability of older workers and promote their integration and retention in the labour market.

Youth employment. The Committee notes with interest the improvement of the situation of young people in the labour market. It notes that the unemployment rate among persons aged 15–24 fell from 20.8 per cent in 2015 to 14.8 per cent in 2017, reaching a low of 11 per cent at the end of April 2018. Correspondingly, the employment rate of young people rose from 29.1 per cent in 2017 to 31 per cent in 2018. The Government refers to a series of active employment measures implemented to assist young people in entering the labour market, including measures aimed at reducing skills mismatches by providing young people with the qualifications or professional experience needed in the labour market, such as training courses and internships. The Committee notes that the revision of the 2004 Act introduced a series of new measures targeted at young people up to the age of 30, including settlement, employment, placement and training vouchers, as well as financial assistance to employers who hire such young persons, through the Labour Fund and the “Work for Young People” programme. In response to the Committee’s previous request regarding the relationship between measures aimed at increasing employment for young people and those focused on retaining older workers in the labour market, the Government indicates that the 2004 Act includes both groups in the category of those who are unemployed in a special situation in the labour market. They are therefore given priority in terms of employment services and benefits. While the Government indicates that it does not have precise studies indicating the degree to which implementation of the Youth Guarantee has contributed to improving the situation of young people in the labour market, it refers in its report to the significant decrease in unemployment rates for young people. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on the contribution of the implementation of the Youth Guarantee to improving the situation of young people in the labour market.

Article 3. Consultations with the social partners. The Government reports that the tripartite Labour Market Council, established under the 2004 Act, enables the social partners to participate in setting the priorities for spending funds from the NTF reserve, and, thus, to decide on the allocation of funds to training for groups of employees, companies/industries or regions that are particularly in need. It adds that social partners participated actively in an assessment carried out to improve the functioning of the NTF and that the draft Labour Market Act includes new provisions aimed at improving the NTF and increasing the role of social partners in decision-making process regarding the allocation of NTF funding. In its observations, the OPZZ expresses concern regarding the lack of consultations in the area of migration policy. It indicates that, in March 2018, the Council of Ministers adopted a document entitled “Social-economic priorities of migration policy”, which provides that the new national migration policy must be adjusted to new labour market priorities and focuses on supplementing labour resources with persons from outside Poland, in professions which face skills gaps. The OPZZ maintains that the social partners were not consulted with regard to this policy. In its reply to the observations, the Government indicates that the document contains only the basic elements of the policy and that work on the Action Plan has not yet been completed, as the document is still being analysed by the relevant ministries involved in its development. The Committee reiterates its request that the Government provide specific information on the manner in which representative organizations of workers and employers and other stakeholders are consulted concerning active employment policies, and the manner in which their support is ensured in the development and implementation of such policies. It further requests the Government to provide information on any developments in relation to the migration policy, and to provide copies of any policy documents adopted in this area.
Romania

Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122) (ratification: 1973)

The Committee notes that the Government’s report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments initially made in 2015.

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Employment trends and active labour market policies. The Government indicates in its report that, taking into account the fact that the number of jobs created by the Romanian economy remains low, due to the economic crisis and restructuring, the most affected population categories are the ones situated at the extremes of the labour market, that is, young people and elderly workers. The Committee notes that the National Strategy for Employment 2014–20 includes specific objectives and directions of action, such as increasing youth employment and extending the working life of the elderly, by reducing youth unemployment and the number of NEET young people (not in employment, education or training) and increasing labour market participation of the elderly. With an employment rate for older workers of 43.1 per cent in 2014 (Romania is situated below the EU-28 average), the inclusion of this category is being hampered by a number of barriers from the perspective of workers, such as uncorrelated skills with actual requirements, but also from the perspective of employers (low productivity of the workforce, resistance to change, reduced adaptability). The Government indicates that, without the participation of older workers, there will be a deficit of human and professional resources. Moreover, facing the perspective of the working-age population decline, the Government states that an increasing rate of women in employment appears to be essential in achieving the national objective in employment established in the context of the Europe 2020 Strategy. With regard to women’s participation in the labour market, registering an employment rate of 16.7 per cent points lower than the rate of men in 2014, the Government indicates that women are situated in a vulnerable position in the Romanian labour market. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the impact and effectiveness of its employment policy measures in terms of productive job creation, in particular for the most vulnerable workers.

Youth employment. The Committee notes that, according to EUROSTAT, the youth unemployment rate was measured at 23.7 per cent in 2013 and 24 per cent in 2014. The Government indicates that, in 2012, the Ministry of Labour elaborated the 2013 national plan to stimulate youth employment. Measures in the plan focused on implementing youth guarantee type programmes, improving the entrepreneurial culture among youth and in small and medium-sized enterprises (SMEs), developing, as well as adapting education and vocational training to the labour market demands. With regard to the integration of young people into the labour market, the Government indicates that the consolidated State Budget financed programmes dedicated to improve youth entrepreneurial skills and the set-up of micro-enterprises by young entrepreneurs. In this regard, 8,000 new jobs were created and young entrepreneurs set up 464 start-ups. At the beginning of 2014, the Ministry of Labour, Family, Social Protection and Elderly launched the Youth Guarantee Implementation Plan 2014–15, a policy framework document developed by the Ministry of Labour in cooperation with other relevant stakeholders. The Committee requests the Government to provide updated information on the impact of the measures taken to facilitate lasting employment opportunities for young people.

The Roma minority. The Committee notes the Government’s statement indicating that the Roma population faces special problems, generated by the low level of education, a low participation on the labour market, the large category of persons not engaged in economic activities which includes homemakers, retirees, persons incapable of work, welfare beneficiaries and unemployed people. In line with EU recommendations, in early 2013 the review of the Governmental Strategy for inclusion of Romanian citizens of Roma minority for the period 2012–20 was initiated. The Committee notes the results of measures implemented targeting the Roma minority in 2012–14. In this regard, 5,302 jobseekers of the Roma minority obtained employment through active employment measures in 2014 (3,023 employment contracts of an indefinite duration and 2,279 fixed-term contracts). The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide detailed information on the impact of the measures taken to enhance the social inclusion and increase employment opportunities of the Roma minority.

Article 3. Participation of the social partners in the formulation and implementation of policies. The Government indicates that, in the context of the reform of the social dialogue legislation, the Law on organizing the Economic and Social Council was adopted in March 2013. The Committee requests the Government to provide specific examples of how the social partners are effectively consulted and participate in decision-making on the matters covered by the Convention. Please also include information on the measures taken or envisaged to ensure that these consultations include representatives of other sectors of the active population, particularly representatives of the Roma minority and of persons working in the rural sector and the informal economy.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Sierra Leone

Employment Service Convention, 1948 (No. 88) (ratification: 1961)

The Committee notes with deep concern that the Government’s report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments initially made in 2004.

Contribution of the employment service to employment promotion. ILO technical assistance. The Committee previously noted the Government’s statement, contained in a report received in June 2004, indicating that the legislation on employment services has been included on the agenda of the Joint Advisory Commission for discussion. It was the Government’s intention to provide a new mandate to employment services so that they are transformed into dynamic labour market information centres. The new employment services will have to cover not only urban centres but also rural areas and ensure the provision of information, planning and the application of employment policies throughout the country. The Government also stated that ILO technical assistance is required to achieve its objectives. The Committee welcomed the fact that the Government was proposing to strengthen employment services. It also recalled that the Office provided support for programmes for the generation of employment opportunities by strengthening employment services for young persons. The Committee hopes that the Government will be in a position to describe in its next report the manner in which the employment services reforms have contributed to securing their essential duty, which is to ensure “the best possible organization of the employment market as an integral part of the national programme for the achievement and maintenance of full employment and the development and use of endeavor to provide productive resources” (Article 1 of the Convention), in cooperation with the social partners (Articles 4 and 5). In this respect, the Committee would be grateful if the Government would provide the statistical information that has been compiled concerning the number of public employment offices established, the number of applications for employment received, the number of vacancies notified and the number of persons placed in employment by such offices (Part IV of the report form).

The Committee expects that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Spain

The Committee notes the observations of the General Union of Workers (UGT) and the Trade Union Confederation of Workers’ Commissions (CCOO), received on 27 July and 11 August 2017, respectively. The Committee also notes the observations of the International Organisation of Employers (IOE), received on 1 September 2017, supporting the observations made by the Spanish Confederation of Employers’ Organizations (CEOE). The Committee also notes the Government’s replies in this regard.

Article 13 of the Convention. Cooperation between the public employment service and private employment agencies. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to indicate how, following prior consultations with the social partners, the arrangements are revised for cooperation between the public employment service and private employment agencies in the context of the framework agreement with employment agencies for collaboration with public employment services on the labour market insertion of jobseekers concluded in 2014 between the public employment service and employment agencies. The UGT reiterates its previous observations that the social partners did not participate in the development or implementation of the framework agreement, as their participation in the monitoring committee for the framework agreement was not stipulated. The UGT asserts that employment policies have not been set in relation to private employment agencies in consultation with the social partners, which has hampered them in performing their functions in the bodies in which they participate: the national employment system and the public employment service. The UGT also alleges that the social partners did not participate in the design and development of the tender documents for private employment agencies, nor in their monitoring and evaluation. The UGT also affirms that the social partners were not involved in determining the amount of the annual budget of the Public State Employment Service (SEPE) that would be allocated to public–private collaboration. The UGT indicates that it has finally received information from the Central Executive Committee of the SEPE, following repeated requests, in relation to the development of the framework agreement and its adoption, implementation and its extension until June 2018. In its observations, the CCOO alleges non-compliance with Article 13 of the Convention by the Government and reiterates its previous comments in which it alleged the systematic absence of social dialogue. In its response to the observations of the workers’ organizations, the Government indicates that it provided information on the framework agreement in the meeting of the National Employment System General Council on 24 July 2013. Regarding the observations of the CCOO, the Government adds that, since 2012, the European Union has been making recommendations to the Spanish Government, in the context of the European Semesters, regarding the need to strengthen public–private collaboration between the public employment service and private employment agencies, in order to improve the assistance provided to jobseekers. The Government indicates that, with a view to achieving this goal, it has been promoting the activities of private employment agencies to supplement the action of the public employment service. The Government adds that Royal Decree No. 1796/2010 of 30 December establishes the private employment agencies as collaborating entities of the public employment service, from which they may receive funding. The Government adds that the social partners were kept informed, via the Central Executive Committee, of the bidding process for the selection of the 80 employment agencies and other aspects of the framework agreement. The UGT indicates that little information was communicated to the social partners and many issues remain to be resolved, such as the content of the private contracts signed by private employment agencies and the regional governments of the Autonomous Communities, which address issues that were not contemplated in the framework agreement or set out in the list of conditions. The UGT indicates that the social partners are not aware of the placement objectives that must be met by private employment agencies, the payments made to private employment agencies, the selection criteria for unemployed persons whose placement will be managed by private employment agencies, the possibility for unemployed persons to choose between the public employment service or a private employment agency, the consideration of placement time and whether contracts are temporary or part time, the requirement to accept employment considered to be underemployment and the related consequences for the unemployed person. In their observations, the CCEO and the IOE assert that, in light of the current unemployment rate, the assistance of the private sector is decisive and urgent. They indicate that the implementation of the public–private collaboration model in employment placement is hampered by administrative constraints, as private employment agencies are seen as competitors by the public sector. As a result, private employment agencies are required to place unemployed persons with a full-time employment contract of at least six months within period of eight months. In its response, the Government indicates that private employment agencies can act independently but in coordination with the public employment service, and/or as collaborating entities through a partnership agreement. The Government specifies that, following the amendment introduced by Royal Legislative Decree No. 8/2014 of 4 July, private employment agencies do not need the authorization of the public employment service; it is sufficient for them to present a declaration to the competent public employment service before taking action. The private employment agencies must also carry out their activities in conformity with the provisions of the partnership agreement, providing the information required by the agreement and guaranteeing that the services funded by the public employment service are free-of-charge for workers and employers. The Committee recalls that, under Article 13 of the Convention, in accordance with national law and practice, consultations shall be conducted with “the most representative organizations of employers and workers” to establish and periodically review conditions to promote cooperation between the public employment service and private employment agencies. The Committee reiterates its request to the Government to indicate the manner in which, following prior consultation with the social partners, the arrangements are revised for cooperation between the public employment service and private employment agencies in the context of the 2014 framework agreement. The Committee also requests the Government to provide updated information on the status of the framework agreement, its content, the number of private employment agencies it covers and the conditions under which these agencies carry out their work at the level of the Autonomous Communities.

Legislative developments. The Committee notes the information provided by the Government in its report on the legislative changes introduced in relation to employment agencies and temporary work agencies under Act No. 18/2014, of 15 October, approving urgent measures for growth, competitiveness and efficiency; and Royal Decree No. 4/2015, of 29 May, approving the regulations covering temporary work agencies. The Committee requests the Government, taking into account the relevant provisions of the legislation in force (Act No. 18/2014 and Royal Decree No. 4/2015), to provide detailed information on the impact in practice of the legislative changes on the activities of private employment agencies, and particularly of temporary employment agencies. The Committee requests the Government to provide detailed information on the manner in which it is ensured that private employment agencies, including temporary work agencies, apply the principle of non-discrimination and provide services to their clients that facilitate their access to decent work, avoiding instances of underemployment and discrepancies between the remuneration received by temporary workers and that received by employees of the client enterprise.

Judicial decisions. The Committee notes with interest the court rulings provided by the Government related to the activities of private employment agencies and the labour rights of temporary workers. The Committee requests the Government to continue providing copies of court rulings relevant to the application of the principle of the Convention.

Sudan

Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122) (ratification: 1970)

Follow-up to the conclusions of the Committee on the Application of Standards (International Labour Conference, 106th Session, June 2017)

The Committee recalls that the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards (CAS), in its June 2017 session, taking into account the persistence of high unemployment and underemployment in the country, which principally affects the most vulnerable persons, women and youth, requested the Government of Sudan to develop a coherent strategy, in the framework of the national policy, to promote full, productive and freely chosen employment with the participation of representatives of the most representative workers’ and employers’ organizations. It also requested the Government to continue availing itself of ILO technical assistance, so that the capacity of employers’ and workers’ representatives could be strengthened.

Articles 1, 2 and 3 of the Convention. Formulation of an employment policy and coordination with poverty reduction. Consultation with the social partners. The Committee welcomes the information provided in the Government’s report in relation to efforts made to implement the conclusions of the CAS. The Government indicates that, to this end, a road map was developed for the implementation of the national employment policy and an agreement was signed between the Government, the ILO and the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP). In addition, a 35-member working group of the tripartite High Consultative Committee for the National Employment Policy was tasked with formulating the policy, in accordance with Decision No. 33 of 28 August 2014 of the Minister of Labour and Administrative Reform. The High Consultative Committee carried out its work through specialized committees and working groups supported by international experts. The Government adds that the High Consultative Committee approved the policy in its final version on 15 November 2017. It was subsequently submitted and approved by the Minister of Labour and Administrative Reform on 13 December 2017, submitted to the Council of Ministers and examined by the joint meeting of technical committees in January 2018. The policy was submitted to the competent department in the Council of Ministers on 25 September 2018. After final review by that department, it will be submitted again to the Council of Ministers for approval. The Committee notes that the draft policy aims to promote productive and freely chosen work in which the worker can use his or her capacities without discrimination. The Government indicates that Sudan’s vision of the future is based on its national strategy 2007–31 and national five-year plans arising from the strategy. The Government adds that the policy is also based on the Sustainable Development Goals and existing poverty reduction strategies. The draft policy provides for operationalizing strategies to: promote growth that supports employment; improve the performance of the labour market; and improve the quantity and quality of the vocational training system. The Government emphasizes that social protection is a priority. The Committee welcomes the efforts made by the Government to develop and implement a national employment policy in accordance with the recommendations made by the Conference Committee. It invites the Government to continue to provide updated detailed information in this regard, and to provide a copy of the policy once it is adopted. In addition, the Committee requests the Government to continue to provide detailed information on the consultations held with the social partners in relation to the formulation and implementation of an active employment policy, as well as to provide information on consultations with representatives of the persons affected by the measures to be taken, such as women, young persons, those working in rural areas and in the informal economy.

Article 2. Collection and use of labour market data. Employment trends. In response to the Committee’s previous request, the Government once again communicates data from the 2011 Labour Force Survey. Noting the Government’s indication that the next Labour Force Survey will be finalized in 2019, the Committee reiterates its request that the Government provide updated statistical data, disaggregated as much as possible, on the situation and trends of employment, unemployment and visible underemployment, in the formal and informal economies.

Uganda

Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122) (ratification: 1967)

The Committee notes that the Government’s report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments initially made in 2017.

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Coordination of employment policy with poverty reduction. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to provide information on the results achieved and the difficulties encountered in attaining the employment policy objectives set out in its National Employment Policy (NEP). The Committee notes the detailed information contained in the evaluation of the implementation of the NEP conducted by the Ministry of Finance, Planning and Economic Development. According to the evaluation findings, the overarching development agenda addressed the most pressing employment challenges, but did not effectively translate into a coherent implementation strategy due to inadequate coordination across the government, inadequate labour market information, conflicting policy objectives and a bias towards short-term priorities over longer-term sustainable progress. In addition, the National Employment Council, the governmental body responsible for coordinating, guiding, streamlining and monitoring efforts towards implementation of the NEP, has not yet been established. The Committee notes that the country has registered a modest increase in total employment in recent years and that lower-productivity activities, such as subsistence agriculture and petty trade have expanded. In this regard, the Committee observes that the percentage of the formal and informal labour engaged in low productivity agricultural activities increased from 69 per cent in 2009 to 72 per cent in 2012–13. Moreover, according to the Uganda Bureau of Statistics (UBOS), the rate of unemployment under the newly revised definition (which counts subsistence farmers as employed persons) was 9.4 per cent in 2012–13, while the underemployment rate during the same period was 8.9 per cent, being especially common in the agricultural sector. Furthermore, while the percentage of people living below the poverty line decreased from 24.3 per cent in 2009–10 to 19.7 per cent in 2012–13, significant disparities in poverty levels persist across regions and between rural and urban areas, with the highest levels of poverty reported in Northern Uganda (44 per cent). The Committee notes the adoption of the second National Development Plan 2015/16-2019/20 (NDPII) in June 2015, whose principal objective is “strengthening the country’s competitiveness for sustainable wealth creation, employment and inclusive growth”. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the results achieved and the challenges encountered in attaining the employment policy objectives set out in the second National Development Plan (NDPII), including results of the programmes established to stimulate growth and economic development, raise living standards, respond to labour force needs and address unemployment and underemployment. The Committee further requests the Government to continue providing up-to-date information, including statistical data disaggregated by economic sector, sex and age, on the current situation and trends regarding the active population, employment, unemployment and underemployment throughout the different regions.

Promotion of youth employment. The Committee previously requested the Government to provide information on the results of the programmes adopted concerning education and vocational training for young persons as well as on efforts made to improve the employment situation for young persons. The Committee notes that, according to the NDPII, young persons make up 21.3 per cent of the total population and 57 per cent of the labour force. According to the UBOS, the number of young persons in employment increased from 63.1 per cent in 2013 to 64.3 per cent in 2015; however, the unemployment rate for young persons also increased from 9.7 per cent in 2013 to 14.7 per cent in 2015. Moreover, the vast majority of all young workers (92 per cent) were engaged in informal employment in 2015. The Committee notes that, in response to high rates of unemployment and poverty among young persons, in December 2016 the Government launched the Youth Livelihood Programme (YLP) under the Ministry of Labour, Gender and Social Development (MLGSD) and with the participation of key stakeholders. The YLP provides young persons with vocational skills and interest-free loans to assist them in becoming self-employed. In relation to the education of the labour force, the Committee notes that the school-to-work transition survey (SWTS-2015) developed by the ILO shows that 68 per cent of young Ugandans not in school had only completed a primary education, while only 3.4 per cent had completed a tertiary education. In this regard, the Committee notes the adoption of the National Adult Literacy Policy 2014 and Action Plan (2011–2015) intended to guide the provision and coordination of adult literacy services. In addition, during 2009–13, enrolment in formal basic, technical, vocational education and training (BTVET) increased by 73 per cent (with 66 per cent men and 34 per cent women). Enrolment in higher education increased by 18 per cent, with a significant increase in female enrolment. Nevertheless, according to the SWTS-2015 findings, young persons with a tertiary level of education had higher levels of unemployment (12 per cent) than the national average. Despite the adoption of the BTVET Strategic Plan 2011–20 in 2011, persistent challenges highlighted by the NDPII in the area of vocational education and training include: inadequate skills to support increased production and expansion; poor work readiness of many young people leaving formal education and entering the labour market; inadequate linkages between employers and workplace learning; and lack of literacy. The Committee requests the Government to provide detailed information on the manner in which the implementation of the Youth Livelihood Programme (YLP) and other programmes providing education and vocational training for young persons has promoted access for young people to full, productive and freely chosen employment. The Committee also requests the Government to provide information on the measures employed or adopted to reduce the unemployment of young people, particularly those with higher levels of education, and to reduce the percentage of young people in informal employment.

Promotion of women’s employment. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to provide information on the measures adopted to improve job creation and increase the labour market participation of women. The Government reports that, according to data derived from the Uganda National Household Survey (UNHS) data 2012–13, 45 per cent of the total employed population were women, but only 39.1 per cent were in wage employment. The NDPII indicates that there has been improvement in the number of women in political leadership and in terms of gender parity in enrolment of boys and girls at the primary school level, in addition to increased ownership of land by women. The Committee also notes the prioritization of gender equality in Uganda’s Vision Statement 2020 as a cross-cutting enabler for socio-economic transformation, and the implementation of the Uganda Women Entrepreneurship Programme (UWEP) under the MLGSD, with the aim of contributing to the creation of self-employment and household wealth through activities such as the mobilization and sensitization of communities, training and capacity development, and provision of access to credit, appropriate technology and markets. The Committee notes, however, that despite the progress made, the conditions sustaining gender inequality persist: gender disparities in access and control over productive resources such as land (only 27 per cent of registered land is owned by women); the limited share of women in wage employment in the non-agricultural sector; higher rates of illiteracy among the female labour force than the male labour force (27.6 per cent of women and 12.3 per cent of men have no formal schooling). Recalling the Committee’s 2014 comments under the Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100), concerning the occupational segregation of women and its contribution to the gender pay gap, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken or envisaged to combat the persistence of occupational segregation on the basis of sex (both vertical and horizontal) and to increase the labour force participation rate of women in the formal labour market.

Informal economy. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to provide information on the measures adopted or envisaged to extend access to justice, property rights, labour rights and business rights to the informal economy workers and business, and to indicate the manner in which Government initiatives relating to micro-enterprises had contributed to improving working conditions in the informal economy. The Committee notes the growing importance of the informal economy, which has absorbed four out of five new entrants into the labour market. According to the SWTS–2015, 92 per cent of young workers were involved in informal employment (93 per cent women and 91 per cent men). The rate of informal employment in rural areas was higher (94 per cent) than that in urban areas (87 per cent). The Government indicates, moreover, that the informal economy is characterized by widespread labour right violations and decent work deficits. In particular, workers in the informal sector are excluded from social security protection and there are important gaps in terms of social dialogue. The Committee notes that the majority of micro-, small and medium-sized enterprises (MSMEs), operate informally. In this respect, the Committee notes the adoption, in consultation with stakeholders, of the Micro-, Small and Medium Enterprise (MSME) Policy in June 2015, which provides opportunities for informal MSMEs to increase their expertise through skills upgrading and certification, and encourages them to formalize their operations in order to enjoy greater legitimacy through government protection. Noting that a growing proportion of the labour force is employed in the informal economy, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the efforts made to extend access to justice, property rights, labour rights and business rights to informal economy workers and business (see General Survey of 2010 on employment instruments, paragraph 69). It also requests the Government to indicate the manner in which the Micro-, Small and Medium Enterprise (MSME) Policy has contributed to improving working conditions in the informal economy, particularly for young persons.

Article 3. Participation of the social partners. The Committee notes that the NDPII was formulated in collaboration with stakeholders, including ministries, local governments, the private sector, civil society organizations and international agencies. In addition, the NDPII emphasizes that the Government should take overall responsibility for its implementation with the participation of the private sector, development partners, the civil society and other non-state actors. The Committee requests the Government to provide detailed information on the involvement of the social partners in the implementation of the second National Development Plan (NDPII). The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122) (ratification: 1982)

The Committee notes the observations of the Independent Trade Union Alliance Confederation of Workers (CTASI), received on 29 August 2018, and also the observations of the International Organisation of Employers (IOE) and the Federation of Chambers and Associations of Commerce and Production of Venezuela (FEDECAMARAS), received on 1 September 2018. The Committee also notes the observations of the National Union of Workers of Venezuela (UNETE), the Confederation of Workers of Venezuela (CTV), the Confederation of Autonomous Trade Unions (CODESA) and the General Confederation of Labour (CGT), received on 26 September 2018. It also notes the Government’s replies to the 2017 observations of the social partners. The Committee requests the Government to provide its comments in relation to the observations received in 2018.

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Implementation of the employment policy within the framework of a coordinated economic and social policy. Measures to respond to the economic crisis. The Committee notes the Committee’s indication, in response to previous comments, that it is continuing to design and implement a range of measures, policies and programmes with a view to strengthening, improving and encouraging better protection, social inclusion and recognition of the social rights of the Venezuelan people. The Government adds that, in this context, it presented the National Economic and Social Development Plan 2019–25 (Plan de la Patria), the objectives of which include employment security, introduced by various decrees, the most recent of which dates from 28 December 2015 and establishes immunity from dismissal for men and women workers for a period of three years. Consequently, during this period dismissals may not be carried out without good grounds and may only occur in strict compliance with the procedures established in the labour legislation. The Government also refers to the implementation of several measures to promote employment, such as the establishment of Social Welfare Divisions, operational units that provide comprehensive services, such as advice, guidance and coordination for: inclusion; re-employment; the granting of benefits for involuntary loss of employment; and labour migration. These services cover men and women workers with disabilities, migrant workers, whose employment has been terminated against their will, and the self-employed. Furthermore, the Government indicates that it has incrementally increased the minimum wage with a view to improving the living conditions of women and men workers. The most recent wage increase, introduced during the reporting period in June 2018, fixed the minimum wage at 3 million bolívares fuertes (Bs. F.) per month. The Government also refers to the implementation of the Socialist Cesta Ticket Act (Decree No. 3.233, published in Special Official Gazette No. 6.354 of 31 December 2017), under which the basis for calculation of the Socialist Cesta Ticket was adjusted for men and women workers who provide services in the public and private sectors to 61 tax units per day, for 30 days per month. Furthermore, under Decree No. 3.393, published in Special Official Gazette No. 41.388 of 30 April 2018, the tax unit amount used for calculation was increased to 580 bolívares (Bs). Lastly, the Government indicates that it maintained the policy of inclusion in the pension system and the standardization of pension payments on the basis of the national minimum wage. In that regard, the Government reports that, in April 2018, there were 3,780,674 beneficiaries, accounting for more than 70 per cent of Venezuelan women over the age of 55 years and men over the age of 60 years.

The Committee also notes that the workers’ confederations UNETE, CTV, CGT and CODESA allege in their observations that the high levels of informality, vulnerability and precarious employment in the country make it difficult to achieve the objectives of decent, productive and quality employment. In this regard, the CTASI indicates that, according to the 2017 National Living Conditions Survey (ENCOVI), 44 per cent of those in employment did not have any type of contract, 10 per cent were employed by means of a verbal contract and 7 per cent had a temporary contract. The CTASI also alleges decreased access to statutory employment benefits. In particular, it reports that in 2017 only 35.5 per cent of workers received paid leave, only 31.1 per cent were registered with the Venezuelan Institute of Social Security (IVSS), 34 per cent received food vouchers and 41.5 per cent reported receiving end-of-year bonuses or allowances. The CTASI asserts that in 2017 some 2.2 per cent of workers were underemployed, meaning that they worked fewer than 15 hours per week. Furthermore, 4.1 per cent of workers earned less than the comprehensive minimum wage, despite working more than 40 hours per week. Regarding workers’ remuneration, the CTASI affirms that, until September 2018 when the country entered hyperinflation, 82 per cent of those employed earned less than the comprehensive minimum wage. According to the CTASI, the cost of going to work was higher than the wages earned by workers. As a result, many preferred to resign from their official jobs in favour of informal activities (the informal economy grew from 30.6 per cent in 2014 to 37.5 per cent in 2017) or to survive on some sort of state funding. UNETE, the CTV and the CGT denounce the current economic measures, adopted after the Government had provided its report, such as the adoption of the new minimum wage of 1,800 bolívares soberanos (Bs.S.) in August 2018 and the unilateral fixing of the Cesta Ticket food voucher at 10 per cent of the minimum wage, infringing the principle of progressivity established in the legal system and eliminating the benefits set out in the collective agreements in force. The Committee also notes that the IOE and FEDECAMARAS once again claim that the Government has still not adopted an effective policy to promote employment. Furthermore, the employers’ organizations refer to International Monetary Fund statistics that predict inflation of 1 million per cent by the end of 2018. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide detailed information on the specific measures taken to formulate and adopt an active employment policy designed to promote full, productive and freely chosen employment, in full compliance with the Convention.

Labour market trends. In response to the Committee’s previous comments, the Government reports that the employment rate was 93 per cent in the second quarter of 2017 and the unemployment rate was 7 per cent. The Government adds that, while men have a higher participation rate (59.8 per cent), the number of women in employment increased from 4,682,402 in 2008 to 5,828,388 in 2017. The Government indicates that this situation is a result of the policies and programmes developed with a view to increasing women’s employment rate including the establishment of institutions to implement those programmes and the capacity development and funding of socio-productive projects for women. The Committee notes the Government’s indication that the employment rate of over-65s increased from 18.6 per cent in 2016 to 66.1 per cent in 2017. The Government also states that the informal economy shrank from 52.4 per cent in 2003 to 42.87 per cent in the second half of 2017. However, the Committee notes that the workers’ confederations UNETE, the CTV, the CGT, CODESA and the CTASI refer to the results of the ENCOVI for 2017, according to which 58.5 per cent of the population were economically active and 41.5 per cent were inactive. They assert that the open unemployment rate increased from 7.4 per cent in 2016 to 9 per cent in 2017. Furthermore, UNETE, the CTV, the CGT and CODESA indicate that income poverty increased from 81.8 per cent in 2016 to 87 per cent in 2017, while extreme poverty increased from 51.5 per cent to 61.2 per cent. They emphasize that there is continuing evidence of profound regional inequality, given that multidimensional poverty affects 34 per cent of households in Caracas (where less than 20 per cent of the population live) but it is less in the least populated zones (which account for 25 per cent of the total population) the poverty rate is more than double, affecting 74 per cent. The workers’ confederations allege that the statistical information provided by the Government does not show the genuine figures. The IOE and FEDECAMARAS regret that official labour force statistics, previously published by the National Institute of Statistics (INE), have not been published since April 2016 and there are no accountability mechanisms that provide information on the most relevant variables regarding the labour force. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide detailed information, including updated statistics disaggregated by age and sex, on the labour market situation and trends in the country. The Committee also requests the Government to continue providing information on the impact of the measures taken to give effect to the Convention.

Transitional labour regime. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to indicate the current situation with regard to the application of Resolution No. 9855, which establishes a transitional labour regime that is compulsory and strategic for the revival of the agro-food sector, and which provides for workers in public and private enterprises to be placed in other enterprises in the sector (requesting enterprises) that are separate from the enterprise that generated the original employment relationship. The Committee notes the Government’s indication that the abovementioned Resolution was issued in the context of the Decree under which the State of Exception and Economic Emergency was declared and in conformity with the provisions of article 305 of the Constitution of the Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela, which provides that the State shall guarantee food sovereignty. The Government also indicates that the Resolution was not implemented while it was in force and, as a result, no worker transfers were conducted as a result of its application. The Government adds that the Resolution was in force for 180 days and no new resolution was issued for its renewal. The Government concludes that, consequently, Resolution No. 9855 has been repealed, as it has had no legal force since January 2017 when it was not renewed. The Committee notes the information provided by the Government in response to its previous request on the status of Resolution No. 9855.

Youth employment. The Committee notes the Government’s statement, in response to its previous comments, that the number of young persons aged between 15 and 24 years in employment increased from 565,727 in 2016 to 670,974 in 2017. The Government indicates that, through the 32 offices of the Meeting Centres for Education and Employment (CEET), a policy has been developed to guarantee the comprehensive inclusion of young persons in the social process of work, taking into account their skills and potential. In 2017, a total of 6,479 young persons were registered with the CEET (57 per cent of whom were men and 43 per cent were women), and subsequently incorporated into the supply chains with the greatest labour needs. The Government reports that 63 per cent of the young persons registered with the CEET are in employment, 31 per cent are unemployed and 6 per cent are seeking work for the first time. The Committee also notes the Government’s reference to, inter alia, the Programme for Comprehensive Assistance, which targets vulnerable people, including: persons with disabilities; young persons between the ages of 18 and 30 years; and university students completing internships, apprenticeships, community service and/or research projects, who are voluntarily involved in the initiation process for work in different areas of employment that are prioritized for strategic reasons. The Government highlights the transformation of the Youth Employment Plan into the Major Youth Employment Mission under Decree No. 3.485 of 22 June 2018, published in Official Gazette No. 41.429 of 28 June 2018. This new Major Mission targets young people between 15 and 35 years of age, with a view to integrating them into productive work in areas associated with meeting human needs, identified through the Carnet de la Patria identity card system, within the framework of the Somos Venezuela (we are Venezuela) movement. In particular, the Major Youth Employment Mission focuses on unemployed graduates, persons without education, persons with family responsibilities, single mothers and socially vulnerable persons. The Government indicates that, one year after it was established, 1.1 million young persons were enrolled in the Mission, 11,647 socio-productive projects benefiting more than 33,000 young people had been approved, and 2,206 young workers had joined public and private enterprises. The Mission’s strategic directions include the promotion and strengthening of a new culture for the social process of work, the “return to the fields” (agricultural and agro-urban production), the promotion of a culture of productive entrepreneurship, and the integration of youth programmes. However, the Committee observes that the Government has still not provided an evaluation, conducted with the participation of the social partners, of the active employment policy measures implemented to reduce youth unemployment and promote their sustainable integration into the labour market, particularly for the most underprivileged categories of young persons. Consequently, the Committee once again requests the Government, with the participation of the social partners, to provide an evaluation of the active employment policy measures implemented to reduce youth unemployment and promote their sustainable integration into the labour market, particularly for the most underprivileged categories of young persons. The Committee also requests the Government to continue providing detailed statistical data, disaggregated by age and sex, on youth employment trends.

Development of small and medium-sized enterprises (SMEs). In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to provide information on the impact of the measures adopted to promote the creation and productivity of small and medium-sized enterprises, and to develop a climate conducive to generating employment in such enterprises. The Committee observes that the Government has not provided information in this respect. The Committee notes that, in their observations, the IOE and FEDECAMARAS assert that, according to INE figures, 40 per cent of the country’s enterprises disappeared between 1998 and 2006. The Committee once again requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken to encourage the creation of SMEs and promote their productivity, and to create a climate conducive to generating employment in such enterprises.

Article 3. Participation of the social partners. In its previous comments, the Committee reiterated its request to the Government to provide information that included specific examples of how account had been taken of the views of employers’ and workers’ organizations in the formulation and implementation of employment policies and programmes. The Committee also once again requested the Government to provide detailed information on the activities of the National Council for the Productive Economy (CNEP) related to the issues covered by the Convention. The Committee notes that the Government has not provided information in this regard in its report. The Committee also notes that, in their observations, the IOE and FEDECAMARAS allege that the Government is not holding consultations or cooperating with the social partners for the formulation of a policy to encourage employment, in conformity with the terms of Article 3 of the Convention. The Committee therefore once again requests the Government to send information that includes specific examples of how account has been taken of the views of employers’ and workers’ organizations in the formulation and implementation of employment policies and programmes and the outcomes of those consultations.
The Committee also once again requests the Government to supply detailed information on the activities of the National Council for the Productive Economy (CNEP) related to the matters covered by the Convention.

In addition, requests regarding certain matters are being addressed directly to the following States: Convention No. 88 (Belize, Guinea-Bissau, Madagascar, Malta, Mongolia); Convention No. 122 (Antigua and Barbuda, Austria, Azerbaijan, Barbados, Plurinational State of Bolivia, Bulgaria, Burkina Faso, Canada, Central African Republic, China: Hong Kong Special Administrative Region, China: Macau Special Administrative Region, Costa Rica, Ecuador, Estonia, Finland, France, France: French Polynesia, Kyrgyzstan, Lebanon, Netherlands: Aruba, Panama, Papua New Guinea, Peru, Romania, Rwanda, Saint Vincent and the Grenadines, Suriname, Tajikistan, The former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, Trinidad and Tobago, United Kingdom: Guernsey, Viet Nam, Yemen); Convention No. 159 (Belgium, Côte d’Ivoire, Egypt, Kyrgyzstan, Madagascar, Malawi, Peru, San Marino, Turkey); Convention No. 181 (Albania, France, France: New Caledonia, Mongolia, Niger, Serbia).
Vocational guidance and training

Guinea

Human Resources Development Convention, 1975 (No. 142) (ratification: 1978)

Article 1 of the Convention. Formulation and implementation of education and training policies. In response to the Committee’s previous comments, the Government indicates that the Ministry of Technical Education, Vocational Training, Employment and Labour has envisaged measures with a view to improving the initial training of teachers. These measures include raising the entry requirements for the teaching profession to the single baccalaureate and granting an incentive bonus of 150,000 Guinean francs (GNF) per month to student teachers during their two years of training in order to attract the best candidates. The Government also reports that a liberalization of private initiatives has facilitated the growth of private schools, which employ a large number of graduates from teacher training colleges. In this context, the Government indicates that a state mechanism has been established for the supervision, inspection and coordination of these private schools at the national and local levels. The Government indicates that, in order to strengthen links between training and employment, a strategy to link the graduates’ final examination to the recruitment competition for the public service is being formulated by an inter-ministerial committee comprising representatives of the public service, finance, budget, national education, literacy and technical education. A strategy targeting the training of young persons is envisaged by the Government through the “Boosting skills for the employability of young persons” (BOCEJ) project, within which vocational and technical training and higher education institutions work with the private sector to prepare training projects via a public–private partnership (PPP) with a view to improving the employability of young graduates. In the context of enhancing the status of the teaching profession, the Committee notes the signature of joint order No. 2018/1629/MESRS/METFPET/SGG of 21 March 2018, issuing Bachelor’s diplomas to graduates of “B” training institutes. The Government adds that, to address the lack of teachers, it has initiated a training programme for 2,000 teachers a year with the support of the World Bank. In this regard, two main innovative training strategies have been implemented: emergency training comprising three months of classroom training and nine months of practical training, followed by three further months of classroom training; and regular training comprising nine months of classroom training and nine months of practical training. The Committee notes that, according to the 2015–17 education sector programme, the Government has implemented several measures to combat the gender inequalities suffered by young women. The Committee therefore requests the Government to indicate the measures taken to eliminate gender inequality between young women and men, and their results. The Committee requests the Government to provide statistical data, disaggregated by age and sex, on the impact of the measures implemented within the framework of the above training strategies and programmes, and a copy of the order of 21 March 2018. The Committee refers to its comments on the Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122), and reiterates its request to the Government to provide detailed information on the manner in which it ensures effective coordination between vocational guidance and training policies and programmes and employment policies and programmes and on the manner in which it facilitates lifelong learning, as envisaged in Paragraph 3(a) of the Human Resources Development Recommendation, 2004 (No. 195). The Committee also requests the Government to indicate the impact of these policies on the creation of decent jobs and poverty eradication in accordance with Paragraph 16 of the Recommendation. Lastly, the Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on the consultation and coordination measures between the various competent bodies to develop comprehensive and collaborative policies and programmes for vocational guidance and training.

Article 5. Cooperation with the social partners. The Government indicates that the social partners, students’ parents, local politicians, the community and non-governmental organizations were heavily involved in the implementation of the training project for 2,000 teachers a year. It adds that it decided, in cooperation with the social partners, that it was necessary to review the project, which was implemented from 2011 to 2012. In this context, the Government and the social partners implemented a new training model through the education sector programme with the institutional support of CEPEC-Lyon International. The Government indicates that the social partners are also involved in the implementation of this model, which is currently in force in teacher training colleges, as part of the practical training of the student teachers. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide detailed information on the participation of the social partners and other concerned parties in the formulation and implementation of vocational guidance and training policies and programmes. The Committee also requests the Government to describe any consultation procedures or mechanisms established in this regard.

Guyana

Paid Educational Leave Convention, 1974 (No. 140) (ratification: 1983)

Articles 2 and 6 of the Convention. Formulation and application of a policy designed to promote the granting of paid educational leave. The Committee recalls that, for many years, it has been requesting the Government to provide information on the measures taken to give effect to the Convention. In its report, the Government provides summaries of court decisions relevant to the granting of paid educational leave in the public service sector. The Government indicates that training in the private sector is undertaken on the basis of a company’s needs, such as succession planning, human resource needs and upgrading of technology, whereas training is implemented through scholarships in the public sector. Training is provided on the basis of the projected labour needs of the Government and training opportunities are advertised within the various Ministries and agencies as well as in national newspapers. The Committee once again recalls that the Convention requires the Government to formulate and apply a policy designed to promote, by methods appropriate to national conditions and practice and by stages as necessary, the granting of paid educational leave for the purpose of occupational training at any level, general, social and civil education and trade union education (Article 2) in consultation with the social partners (Article 6). Noting that the information provided in the Government’s report does not indicate the manner in which Article 2 of the Convention is given effect, the Committee requests the Government to indicate the content and scope of the policy to promote the granting of paid educational leave for the purposes specified in Article 2 of the Convention and to communicate the texts, including government statements, declarations and other documents, in which the policy is expressed. In addition, the Committee once again reiterates its request that the Government provide full particulars on the measures taken or envisaged in order to give effect to these provisions of the Convention.

Articles 5 and 6. Arrangements for paid educational leave through collective agreements. Consultation with the social partners. The Committee notes the Government’s indication that the National Tripartite Committee established in 1993 has constituted a subcommittee to deal with training and placement issues. It adds that there is no information available on the manner in which the public authorities, representative employers’ and workers’ organizations and institutions providing education or training have been consulted on the formulation and application of the national policy to promote the granting of paid educational leave for the purposes specified in the Convention. The Government states that the social partners make provision for some measure of paid educational leave in the private sector through the bargaining process. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the arrangements to enable the participation of employers’ and workers’ organizations and institutions providing education or training in the formulation and application of the national policy for the promotion of paid educational leave for the purposes specified in Article 2 of the Convention.

Article 8. Non-discrimination. The Government indicates that training under Article 2(a) includes training for apprentices and groups in vulnerable situations. In this regard, the Committee notes that the Industrial Training Act, Chapter 39:01, referenced in the Government’s report, regulates apprenticeships, but that section 3(1) of the Act refers only to male apprentices (boys). The Government does not provide information regarding training for groups in vulnerable situations. The Committee requests the Government to provide information, including statistical data disaggregated by sex, on the apprenticeship training opportunities available to boys and girls. Noting that section 3(1) of the Industrial Training Act could be interpreted to exclude girls, it also invites the Government to consider amending the Act to extend apprenticeships to both male and female apprentices. It also requests the Government to provide particulars regarding the measures taken to ensure that groups in vulnerable situations have access to paid educational leave.

Application of the Convention. Part V of the report form. The Committee requests the Government to provide a general appreciation of the manner in which the Convention is applied, including, for instance, extracts from reports, studies and enquiries, and statistics disaggregated by sex and age on the number of workers granted paid educational leave during the reporting period.

Republic of Moldova

Article 1(1) and (2) of the Convention. Formulation and implementation of education and training policies and programmes. The Committee notes the Government’s report received in October 2013 which includes detailed and comprehensive information in response to its 2009 direct request. The National Development Strategy “Moldova 2020” was approved in 2012 and comprises among its development priorities the education system’s alignment with labour market needs, in order to enhance labour productivity and increase employment. The Government indicates that, since 2010, a module on personal development and careers as well as a module on labour law have been included in the modernized curriculum of civic education. In general, educational institutions extra-curricular activities, such as vocational guidance, meetings with labour law specialists and economic agents, are being offered. Furthermore, in gymnasiums, students are offered a number of optional courses, including ethics in business, customer protection, entrepreneurial training, and education for gender equality and equal opportunities. The Committee notes that, in 2013, 17 vocational technical institutions offering the possibility of involvement in 49 professions and occupations were contracted for the purposes of training the unemployed. Moreover, the National Employment Agency (NEA) carries out an annual study “Labour Market Forecast/Prognosis” in order to achieve effective occupational training programmes in connection with labour market requirements. The NEA’s 35 territorial structures take into account the relevant labour market prognosis when carrying out their services (namely vocational guidance and orientation, as well as occupational training for the unemployed). The Committee welcomes the information received and invites the Government to continue providing further information on the design and implementation of education and training policies and programmes, closely linked with employment needs.
Article 4. Vocational training and lifelong learning. The Government indicates that, in accordance with the National Development Strategy, the policy in the field of education will be orientated towards ensuring its quality. The training of a skilled labour force will be ensured by promoting career guidance and providing lifelong occupational training opportunities. The Committee notes with interest that the Development Strategy of Vocational/Technical Education (2013–20) was adopted in February 2013, together with its action plan. The Government indicates that the overall objective of the Development Strategy is to modernize and streamline vocational and technical education, in order to increase the competitiveness of the national economy; the specific objective No. 2 provides for vocational training based on skills and its adjustment to labour market requirements. The Committee invites the Government to provide up-to-date information on the implementation of the Development Strategy of Vocational/Technical Education (2013–20). It also invites the Government to supply information in respect of any lifelong learning measures adopted.

Article 5. Cooperation with social partners. The Committee notes that the National Council for Occupational Standards and Certification of Professional Skills is the platform for social dialogue since June 2008. The Council helps to ensure synergy between vocational and technical education, the labour market, and the national economy. The Committee invites the Government to provide further information on the steps taken, in the framework of the National Council, to involve the social partners in the formulation and implementation of vocational guidance and vocational training policies and programmes.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Poland

Paid Educational Leave Convention, 1974 (No. 140) (ratification: 1979)

The Committee notes the observations of the Independent and Self-Governing Trade Union “Solidarność”, received on 31 August 2018, together with the Government’s report, as well as the Government’s reply to these observations, received on 22 October 2018.

Articles 2–5 of the Convention. Granting paid educational leave. The Committee notes that, according to the information provided in the Government’s report, the Labour Code governs the issue of the right to paid educational leave for employees seeking to improve their professional qualifications. In its observations, Solidarność indicates that the use of such leave is conditional on the employer’s initiative or consent. The Committee notes once again that general, social or civic education and trade-union-related education is not addressed under the Labour Code. The Government indicates that education in these areas is regulated by special acts. Solidarność observes that, according to section 103 of the Labour Code, an employee aiming to increase his or her qualifications in areas other than professional will be granted leave, but will not be entitled to remuneration. Solidarność adds that there is no regulation in the Labour Code that would recognize training time as working time, with the exception of the time spent by an employee to participate in occupational safety and health (OSH) training, which is treated as working time. In its response to the observations of Solidarność, the Government refers to the position of the National Labour Inspectorate, that an employee’s participation in training held to increase professional qualifications or develop specific skills needed in a given workplace is considered as working time when participation in the training is compulsory. The Committee notes that, in respect of paid leave for trade union education, according to section 31(3) of the Act on trade unions, the right to paid leave is granted to employees holding trade union functions and not to all employees, and only in relation to the performance of ad hoc activities arising from their trade union functions. According to the Government, this is in line with Article 10 of the Convention which provides for the ability to introduce different requirements for employees, depending on the type of training undertaken. Solidarność observes that this provision does not extend to those employees who do not perform any union function. It adds that participation in union-related training, which by its nature is organized and announced in advance, does not meet the ad hoc criterion. Thus, Solidarność observes that neither the Labour Code nor the Act on trade unions contains provisions on the granting of paid educational leave to enable workers to participate in trade union education. With respect to the issue of eligibility, the Committee notes that paragraph 17 of the Paid Educational Leave Recommendation, 1974 (No. 148), provides that, in determining eligibility for paid educational leave, account should be taken of the types of education or training programmes available and of the needs of workers and their organizations and of undertakings, as well as of the public interest. The Committee nevertheless notes that, while eligibility conditions may vary, the Convention does not contemplate limiting paid educational leave to only ad hoc trade union activities. The Committee notes the establishment of the National Training Fund (NTF) in 2015, to support investments in human resources, which is favourably assessed by Solidarność. In its response to the observations, the Government highlights that, since the NTF is a fund for employed persons, regulations on leave taken for training purposes are an important part of the rules governing the functioning of the NTF. The Committee recalls that the Government, in its previous report, indicated that, aiming to increase the role of the social partners in the management of labour fund resources and programming and monitoring of labour market policy, it planned to establish labour market boards that will be created in place of employment boards. The Government does not, however, provide information on whether the labour market boards were in fact established. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the manner in which the right to paid educational leave for general, social, civic or trade union education is ensured in practice (Article 2 of the Convention). It also reiterates its request that the Government include documentation, such as reports, studies and statistics that would permit an appreciation of the application of the Convention in practice (Part V of the report form). It requests the Government to continue to provide information on the manner in which employers’ and workers’ organizations are involved in the formulation and application of the policy for the promotion of paid educational leave and to provide specific information on the establishment of the labour market boards (Article 6).
The Committee notes the observations of the Independent and Self-Governing Trade Union “Solidarność” received on 9 August 2018, as well as the Government’s reply to these observations, received on 22 October 2018.

Articles 1–4 of the Convention. Formulation and implementation of policies and programmes of vocational guidance and vocational training. The Committee notes the information provided in the Government’s report in response to its 2013 observation. The Committee notes the Government’s continued efforts to improve the quality and effectiveness of vocational guidance and training. The Government refers to a series of amendments made to the 2004 Act on employment promotion and labour market institutions (the Act), from 2013 to 2017, particularly the revision of 14 March 2014, which entered into force on 27 May 2014, introducing changes in the area of vocational guidance aimed at better adapting the services offered by labour offices to the needs of their clients, thereby improving the efficiency of Public Employment Service (PES) operations. According to the Government, vocational guidance and information services and job search assistance services, were rolled into a single vocational guidance service. A certain number of PES staff were transferred to positions as vocational counsellors and provided with training to enhance their skills, thereby increasing the number of counsellors and the availability of vocational guidance services. The Committee notes that 48,806 unemployed persons benefited from the individual and group vocational guidance provided by PES labour offices in 2017, a decline from 74,016 unemployed persons in 2013. The Government attributes this decline to the corresponding decline in the Polish unemployment rate during this period. The Committee also notes the introduction of two new forms of vocational guidance aimed at addressing the needs of PES customers due to the rapid development of information technologies: distance guidance and distance information services. In its observations, Solidarność maintains that there is no broad access to vocational counselling offered by the PES, which mainly focuses on registered unemployed persons. In its reply, the Government reports that both unemployed persons and jobseekers, with different levels of education and professional qualifications, in different stages of their professional development, have the opportunity to use the free career counselling services provided by the PES. It further indicates that district employment offices provide individual or group advice, professional information and training in the area of job search skills to registered unemployed persons, as well as support in the field of professional information to those who are not registered. In relation to vocational education, the Government reports that the 14 March 2014 revisions to the 2004 Act, expanded the assistance provided for long-term unemployed persons – young persons under the age of 30 and older workers 50 or older – to help them enter and remain in the labour market. The Committee notes that employers hiring young people are now provided support through new instruments: training vouchers and placement vouchers. Under the placement voucher system, the unemployed person is granted a six-month internship with a designated employer, who commits to employ the individual for an additional six months. The Government indicates that since 2015, internships are available not only for young persons, but also for all groups of unemployed persons in a difficult situation on the labour market. Solidarność nevertheless indicates that the Government has not developed a coherent youth policy that takes into account the special needs of young people on the labour market or that provides them with support at various stages of their professional career. In its reply, the Government reports that support for young people is provided by the Voluntary Labour Corps – units supervised by the Minister for Labour and specialized in activities for youth aged 15–25, particularly those at risk of social exclusion. The Government also reports the establishment of the National Training Fund (NTF) in 2015 to support investments in human resources. In this respect, it notes that the amount of the annual funds available from the NTF is approximately 200 million Polish zloty (PLN), which is intended to support co-financing of lifelong learning for employees and employers undertaken at the initiative of, or with the consent of, the employer. The Committee notes that, during the 2014–17 period, the PES used these funds to support training for approximately 315,000 working people. In addition, the Government refers to a series of activities in the area of lifelong learning. The Committee notes, with interest, that in 2017, more than 80 per cent of unemployed persons secured employment after completing the internship program, the highest ratio in five years. Solidarność nonetheless maintains that the PES does not promote vocational training for adults. Noting that, in 2016, only 242 people took up adult vocational training, Solidarność attributes this to the low remuneration offered to a person undergoing adult vocational training, as well as to the heavy administrative burdens. It adds that access to measures for training to improve professional qualifications was curtailed after the NTF resources for 2018 were reduced. In its reply, the Government indicates that, in 2017, over 50,000 people took part in training, which is extremely popular among both the unemployed and jobseekers. The Government also reports that, in 2018, the amount of PLN105,608 (US$28,086,100) was allocated to the NTF and the role of the social partners in deciding on the allocation of NTF funds was strengthened, as the tripartite Labour Market Council decides on the spending priorities for 30 per cent of NTF funds. The Committee notes that activities intended to support students in undertaking educational and career decisions carried out by the Ministry of National Education and the introduction in 2016 of classes in vocational guidance. It further notes that a Bill amending the Act – Education Law and the Act on the education system and certain other acts, which proposes further changes to the vocational education system, is being reviewed at the interdepartmental level and the social partners are being consulted. It is expected to be finalized in September 2019. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide detailed information, including updated statistical data disaggregated by age and sex, on the impact of the measures taken to develop comprehensive and coordinated policies and programmes in relation to vocational guidance, education and training and lifelong learning linked with the PES. It further requests the Government to provide information on the results of measures taken to assist disadvantaged persons in accessing vocational guidance and training.
vocational education and training services adapted to their needs, including young persons, older workers, the long-term unemployed and persons with disabilities. Noting the reduction of NTF resources for 2018, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the reasons for this reduction, as well as information on the availability of other resources to support education and training to enable individuals to improve their professional qualifications. It also requests the Government to provide a copy of the Bill amending the Act – Education Law and the Act on the education system and certain other acts, once it has been adopted.

Article 5. Cooperation with employers’ and workers’ organizations. The Government reports that it undertook a series of activities aimed at enhancing cooperation with Polish employers in formulating and implementing vocational education and training policies and programmes. In this regard, the Committee notes the establishment on 20 January 2015 of a tripartite consultative team responsible for vocational education issues. The Government indicates that the work of the team led to the introduction of a regulation issued by the Minister of National Education on 11 August 2015, which provides for the organization of practical classes at employers’ workplaces that are tailored to the employers’ needs. The Government adds that, to promote coordination and coherence in the provision of vocational education and training, the Ministry of National Education took measures to secure the engagement of representatives of employers’ organizations, local government and professional associations. The Committee notes that, following consultations with employers, the educational system was restructured in September 2017 to provide for the inclusion of a three-year industrial I-tier school providing technical education. In addition, employers’ representatives identified vocational qualification needs on the labour market, resulting in the development of new training curricula in 60 professions, including in five auxiliary professions for students with mental disabilities. The Committee welcomes the new training curricula which were introduced in vocational schools in September 2017. In its observations, Solidarność alleges that the social partners are not actively included in the process of developing educational and labour market policies, and have no voice with regard to the manner in which Labour Fund resources are spent. Moreover, Solidarność maintains that it was not afforded the opportunity to be substantially involved in the process of drafting the new Labour Market Act. The Government, in its reply, indicates that the draft of the new Act was sent for discussion to the Social Dialogue Council and the Labour Market Council, and that it provided the required thirty-day period for review of the draft. Noting the efforts of the Government to enhance cooperation with employers in formulating and implementing vocational education and training policies, the Committee requests the Government to provide updated information on the manner in which the representative organizations of both employers and workers, as well as relevant institutions, have been consulted in the formulation, implementation and monitoring of vocational training and vocational guidance policies and programmes.

Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela

Paid Educational Leave Convention, 1974 (No. 140) (ratification: 1983)

The Committee notes the observations made by the National Union of Workers of Venezuela (UNETE), the Confederation of Workers of Venezuela (CTV), the General Confederation of Labour (CGT) and the Confederation of Autonomous Trade Unions (CODESA), received on 26 September 2018. The Committee requests the Government to provide its comments in this respect.

Articles 2 to 6 of the Convention. Development and application of a policy to promote the granting of paid educational leave. Participation of the social partners. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to indicate cases in which the Basic Labour Act on men and women workers (LOTTT) provides for the granting of paid educational leave, within the meaning of the Convention. In its report, the Government refers to section 316 of the LOTTT, which provides that “men and women employers may grant leave to men and women workers who are engaged in studies”. The Government adds that, under the national legislation the employer is not under an obligation to grant paid educational leave. However, in accordance with the provisions of sections 298 and 300 of the LOTTT, employers are required to hire apprentices and admit interns when so requested by educational institutions. Likewise, the objectives set by the National Executive for the technical and educational training of men and women workers could require employers to provide the necessary space and personnel for the development of training plans for their men and women workers, without this involving the interruption of their productive work. In this regard, the Committee recalls “the essential requirement that educational or training activities should take place during working hours. The time devoted to these activities must be included in working hours if there is to be genuine educational leave […]” (see the 1991 General Survey on human resources development, paragraph 349). The Government indicates that paid educational leave is guaranteed when collective agreements are concluded, which sometimes include the right to such leave. In such cases, the worker and the employer decide how the educational leave will be taken in such a way that it has the least possible impact on working time, for which purpose it could be agreed to change the worker’s hours and the manner determined in which the worker must make up the hours to achieve the work goals. However, the Committee notes that UNETE, CTV, CGT and CODESA indicate that, as a result of the abolition of the different wage scales and the establishment of a single wage in September 2018, regardless of occupation, educational status or length of service, all collective agreements previously concluded were de facto abolished, thus eliminating the benefits and incentives set out in those agreements for accessing comprehensive, continuing and lifelong education, including paid educational leave. The trade unions observe that these actions have removed workers’ opportunities for development or advancement in the country. The Committee observes that the Government does not provide information in its report on the policies or measures adopted with a view to promoting the granting of paid educational leave for the specific purposes set out in Article 2. In that respect, the Committee recalls that the Convention requires the formulation and application of “a policy designed to promote, by methods appropriate to national conditions and practice and by stages as necessary, the granting of paid educational leave” (Article 2) with the participation of the social partners (Article 6). The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the formulation and application of policies and measures to promote the granting of paid educational leave for vocational development at any level, and for trade union education (Articles 2 and 5), and to provide the relevant texts. The Committee also requests the Government to indicate the manner in which paid educational leave is granted, and particularly: (a) the conditions that workers must fulfil to benefit from such leave; (b) the duration of the leave; and (c) the level of the financial benefits paid (Article 3). The Committee also requests the Government to provide updated statistics, disaggregated by sex, showing the number of workers granted paid educational leave (Part V of the report form).

The Committee notes the observations made by the National Union of Workers of Venezuela (UNETE), the Confederation of Workers of Venezuela (CTV), the General Confederation of Labour (CGT) and the Confederation of Autonomous Trade Unions (CODESA), received on 26 September 2018. The Committee requests the Government to provide its comments in this respect.

Articles I–5 of the Convention. Implementation of policies and programmes of vocational guidance and training. Cooperation with the social partners. In response to the Committee’s previous comments, the Government reports the establishment in 2014 of the Office of the Deputy Minister for Education and Work for Freedom, under the auspices of the People’s Ministry for the Social Process of Labour, of which the main function is to propose objectives, policies, plans and strategies for the collective, comprehensive, continued and permanent training and self-training of workers, to be implemented by the different educational missions and universities. The Government adds that the Office has a presence in the different regions through 32 offices, known as education and work drop-in centres (CEET), which implement training programmes with a view to ensuring the inclusion of young people in the social process of work for the purposes of, inter alia, improving their educational conditions and opportunities. In this regard, the Government refers to the establishment in 2018 of the Major Youth Employment Mission, targeting nationals or foreign nationals with ten years of residence in the country, between the ages of 15 and 35 years. Its main objectives include the training of young people in farming and various areas of “cryptoeconomics” and the promotion of a culture of entrepreneurship among young people. The Government indicates that the Major Mission consists of five wide-ranging elements, which include the design and implementation of a training plan in strategic areas to meet food, production and healthcare needs in the country. The Committee also notes the information provided by the Government on the programmes developed by the National Institute for Socialist Education and Training (INCES), such as the national programme for the training of apprentices, in the framework of which enterprises with 15 or more workers are required to employ and train apprentices between the ages of 14 and 18 years. The Government adds that the development of a strategic plan for productive training is envisaged, which will be implemented by the INCES. The Committee notes the indication of the workers’ organizations UNETE, CTV, CGT and CODESA that the absence of food security, interruptions in the water, electricity and gas supply in homes and transport issues have had a negative effect on the performance of the school-age population and their regular school attendance. The trade unions indicate that, currently, 38 per cent – four out of ten – of children and young persons between the ages of 3 and 17 years have ceased to attend school for various reasons, including transport issues, power cuts or a lack of food. With respect to young people between the ages of 18 and 24 years, the trade unions observe that 48 per cent – almost half – are not in education. They also emphasize that workers’ reduced buying power limits their and their children’s opportunities to access vocational education and training, and the public education sector is also experiencing staffing issues owing to the emigration of teachers to other countries in search of better living conditions as a result of the situation in the country. Lastly, the Committee observes that the Government has not provided information on the manner in which, in accordance with Article 5 of the Convention, cooperation is ensured with the social partners and representatives of the private sector in the development and implementation of vocational training and guidance programmes and policies to achieve the objectives of the Convention. Observing that the information provided by the Government only refers to young persons, the Committee requests the Government to supply detailed information on the measures taken or envisaged with a view to guaranteeing access to vocational training and guidance for men and women workers, particularly vulnerable groups of workers, such as women, persons with disabilities, indigenous or tribal peoples and persons in rural areas or remote communities. The Committee also requests the Government to indicate how it is guaranteed that workers have the freedom to choose the vocational guidance and training programmes in which they wish to participate, in conformity with Article 1(5) of the Convention. The Committee also requests the Government to continue to provide updated information, including statistics disaggregated by age and sex, on the impact of the policies and programmes implemented in relation to vocational guidance and training. Furthermore, the Committee once again requests the Government to provide specific and detailed information on the manner in which the social partners and representatives of the private sector have been consulted in relation to the formulation, implementation and monitoring of vocational guidance and training policies and programmes (Article 5).
Direct requests

In addition, requests regarding certain matters are being addressed directly to the following States: Convention No. 140 (Afghanistan, Belize, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Chile, Finland, Guinea, Hungary, Iraq, Kenya, Montenegro, Netherlands: Aruba, Nicaragua, San Marino, Slovakia, Sweden, United Republic of Tanzania, The former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, United Kingdom: Anguilla, United Kingdom: Jersey); Convention No. 142 (Afghanistan, Antigua and Barbuda, Argentina, Burkina Faso, Central African Republic, Cuba, Denmark, France: French Polynesia, Georgia, Hungary, Iraq, Kenya, Kyrgyzstan, Latvia, Lebanon, Mexico, Netherlands: Aruba, Nicaragua, Niger, Switzerland, Tajikistan, United Republic of Tanzania, The former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, Tunisia).

The Committee noted the information supplied by the following State in answer to a direct request with regard to: Convention No. 142 (Italy).
Employment security

Democratic Republic of the Congo

Termination of Employment Convention, 1982 (No. 158) (ratification: 1987)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government’s report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments initially made in 2013.

Observations by the Labour Confederation of Congo (CCT). Abusive dismissals. The CCT expresses concern at a collective labour dispute which involved the massive, abusive and unlawful dismissal of around 40 employees of a private multinational enterprise governed by French law, in which the public authorities are reported to have let the situation deteriorate, disregarding the provisions of the Convention. The CCT also refers in this context to the wilful violation by the employer of the OECD Guidelines for Multinational Enterprises, and particularly those on employment and industrial relations. The Committee notes that the CCT called on the authorities to ensure the reinstatement of workers subjected to abusive and unlawful dismissal and the application of the provisions of the Convention respecting severance allowances and collective dismissals. The Committee invites the Government to provide its own comments on the observations of the CCT. It hopes that the Government will be in a position to indicate whether the dismissals referred to were based on valid reasons (Article 4 of the Convention) and whether the dismissed workers were entitled to severance allowances (Article 12). It also requests the Government to provide information on the measures adopted to mitigate the effects of the dismissals, such as those envisaged in Paragraphs 25 and 26 of the Termination of Employment Recommendation, 1982 (No. 166). It recalls that the ILO can provide assistance to promote the Tripartite Declaration of Principles concerning Multinational Enterprises and Social Policy.

In reply to the previous comments, the Government has provided the relevant provisions of Act No. 13/005 of 15 January 2013 relating to the conditions of service of military members of the armed forces of the Democratic Republic of the Congo (Article 2(4) of the Convention). The Committee once again invites the Government to provide a report containing information on the practice of the labour inspectorate and the decision of the courts on matters of principle relating to the application of Articles 4, 5 and 7 of the Convention. Please indicate the number of appeals against termination, their outcome, the nature of the remedy awarded and the average time taken for an appeal to be decided (Parts IV and V of the report form).

Article 7. Procedure prior to, or at the time of, termination. The Government has provided the text of the national interoccupational collective agreement of December 2005, which does not appear to envisage the possibility of a specific procedure to be followed prior to, or at the time of, termination, as required by the Convention. The Committee once again invites the Government to provide copies of collective agreements which have provided for this possibility and to indicate in its next report the manner in which this provision of the Convention is given effect for workers not covered by collective agreements.

Article 12. Severance allowance and other income protection. The Government indicates in its report that section 63 of the Labour Code of 2002 protects employment and recommends reinstatement in the event of the abusive termination of the employment contract. In the absence of reinstatement, damages are set by the labour tribunal. The Committee emphasizes that this method of compensating unjustified termination, namely through the granting of damages by the court, is covered more by Article 10 of the Convention, which envisages the payment of adequate compensation or such other relief as may be deemed appropriate. The severance allowance, which is one form of income protection, needs to be distinguished from damages paid in the event of unjustified termination. Under the terms of Article 12 of the Convention, a worker whose employment has been terminated shall be entitled, in accordance with national law and practice, to either a severance allowance or other separation benefits; or to benefits from unemployment insurance or assistance or other forms of social security; or a combination of such allowance and benefits. The Committee recalls its previous comments and notes that the Labour Code does not specify the severance allowance which is to be paid to workers, in accordance with Article 12 of the Convention. The Committee once again invites the Government to indicate the manner in which effect is given to Article 12 of the Convention.

Article 13 and 14. Terminations for economic or similar reasons. The Government indicates that the Ministry of Employment, Labour and Social Welfare signed 15 orders authorizing collective terminations for economic or similar reasons, covering 701 workers in 2012–13. The Committee invites the Government to indicate whether the dismissed workers were entitled to severance allowances (Article 12). It hopes that the Government will also be in a position to provide information on the measures taken to mitigate the effects of these terminations, as envisaged in Paragraphs 25 and 26 of the Termination of Employment Recommendation, 1982 (No. 166).

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Papua New Guinea

Article 1 of the Convention. For a number of years, the Committee has requested information concerning the ongoing revision of the Industrial Relations Bill which, according to the Government’s 2013 report, includes provisions on termination of employment with the objective of giving effect to the Convention. In its reply to the Committee’s previous comments, the Government indicates that the draft Industrial Relations Bill is still pending with the Department of Labour and Industrial Relations and is undergoing final technical consultations. The Government adds that the Department of Labour and Industrial Relations Technical Working Committee has carried out various consultations with national stakeholders, such as the Department Attorney General’s Office, the Office of the Solicitor General, the Constitution Law Reform Commission, the Department of Personnel Management, the Department of Treasury and the Department of Planning, Trade Commerce and Industry, as well as with external technical partners, including the ILO. Referring to its previous comments, the Committee once again expresses the hope that the Government will take the necessary measures to ensure that the new legislation gives full effect to the provisions. of the Convention. It also reiterates its request that the Government provide a detailed report to the ILO and a copy of the legislation as soon as it is enacted, so as to enable the Committee to examine its compliance with the Convention.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Direct requests

In addition, requests regarding certain matters are being addressed directly to the following States: Convention No. 158 (Malawi, Saint Lucia, Yemen).
Wages

Belarus

Protection of Wages Convention, 1949 (No. 95) (ratification: 1961)

Article 4 of the Convention. Partial payment of wages in kind. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to take measures to ensure that the payment of wages in kind could only be partial, in conformity with Article 4. The Committee notes that the Government confirms in its report that under section 74 of the Labour Code, payment of wages in the form of allowances in kind is possible in part or in full. The Committee therefore requests the Government to take the necessary measures, including by revising section 74 of the Labour Code, to ensure that the payment of wages in kind could only be partial, in conformity with Article 4.

Plurinational State of Bolivia

Protection of Wages Convention, 1949 (No. 95) (ratification: 1977)

Articles 4, 6, 7, 8 and 12 of the Convention. Protection of the wages of indigenous agricultural workers. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the measures taken by the Government to combat forced labour and abusive practices in the payment of wages to indigenous agricultural workers and asked the Government to provide information on the impact of these measures on the situation of the workers. The Committee notes that the Government provides information in its report on the activities of the Fundamental Rights Unit at the Ministry of Labour to protect the labour rights of indigenous agricultural workers and on the results of the integrated mobile inspection units, particularly in remote rural areas and in enterprises that employ indigenous workers. The Committee also notes that this subject is addressed in the context of monitoring the application of the Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29). In this respect, the Committee refers to its comments on the application of Convention No. 29.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee notes the observations of the Confederation of Private Employers of Bolivia (CEPB) and the International Organisation of Employers (IOE), received on 31 August and 7 November 2018.

Follow-up to the conclusions of the Committee on the Application of Standards (International Labour Conference, 107th Session, May–June 2018)

The Committee notes the discussion that took place in the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards (hereinafter Conference Committee) in June 2018 concerning the application of the Convention. The Committee notes that the Conference Committee urged the Government without delay to: (i) carry out full consultations in good faith with the most representative employers’ and workers’ organizations with regard to minimum wage setting; (ii) take into account when determining the level of the minimum wage the needs of workers and their families as well as economic factors as set out in Article 3 of the Convention; (iii) avail itself of ILO technical assistance to ensure without delay compliance with the Convention in law and practice; and (iv) accept an ILO direct contacts mission. The Conference Committee also recommended the Government to submit a detailed report to the Committee of Experts in 2018.

Articles 3 and 4(1)–(2) of the Convention. Elements for the determination of the level of minimum wages and full consultation with the social partners. The Committee notes the Government’s indication in its report that: (i) the national minimum wage was increased for 2018 by Supreme Decree No. 3544 of 1 May 2018; (ii) socio-economic elements taken into account for fixing the national minimum wage include inflation, productivity, gross domestic product (GDP), GDP per capita, the consumer price index, economic growth, unemployment rates, market fluctuations and the cost of living; (iii) for 2018, the corresponding consultations were held firstly with the CEPB and then with the Bolivian Workers’ Confederation (COB); (iv) the Government held meetings with the representatives of both workers and employers and consultations were held on their criteria and proposals regarding wages; and (v) both parties maintain their positions and it is for the Government to seek the right balance. Moreover, the Committee notes that the CEPB and the IOE indicated in their observations, and in the discussion in the Conference Committee, that: (i) the employers could not formulate criteria with regard to minimum wage fixing; (ii) between 2006 and 2018, the increase in the national minimum wage was much higher than aggregate inflation for this period; (iii) the 2018 increase in the minimum wage did not take account of variables such as the productivity index, enterprise sustainability, the creation of more and better jobs, and the rise in the rate of informality; and (iv) the Government did not comply with the recommendations of the Conference Committee as regards convening a with the employers and the workers to discuss the fixing of the minimum wage. Furthermore, the Committee notes that the Worker members indicated in the Conference Committee that: (i) the increase in the minimum wage had taken account of a set of recommendations presented by the COB, and also socio-economic factors such as inflation, productivity, GDP, GDP per capita, the consumer price index, economic growth, unemployment rates, market fluctuations and the cost of living; and (ii) it was important to engage in social dialogue and consultations with the social partners before fixing the minimum wage.
The Committee observes that while the Government states that consultations were held with the social partners, the CEBP and the IOE claim the opposite. Furthermore, the Committee observes that there are divergences regarding the criteria reportedly taken into consideration in determining the minimum wage. The Committee recalls once again that the Convention requires full consultations in good faith with the representative employers’ and workers’ organizations concerned with respect to the establishment, operation and modification of machinery for fixing and adjusting the minimum wage from time to time (Article 4(1)–(2)), and that the active participation of these organizations is essential to allow optimal consideration of all the relevant factors in the national context (2014 General Survey on minimum wage systems, paragraph 285). In this context, the Committee notes with regret that the Government has still not responded to the request made by the Conference Committee to accept a direct contacts mission. In this regard, the Committee recalls that direct contacts missions involve sending a representative of the ILO Director-General to the country concerned with a view to finding a solution to the difficulties faced in the application of ratified Conventions. The work of the mission is to ascertain the facts and examine possibilities in situ for resolving the problems raised. It is an effective form of dialogue designed to find a positive solution to the issues in question. The Committee expresses the firm hope that this mission can take place without delay and that it will help to resolve the issues related to the application of the Convention.

The Committee notes the observations of the Trade Union Confederation of Burundi (COSYBU), received on 30 August 2018, and the Government’s reply.

Article 3 of the Convention. Operation of the minimum wage-fixing machinery. Further to its previous comments in this respect, the Committee notes the Government’s indication in its report that it has commissioned two studies, one on an equitable wage policy and the other on the classification of jobs in Burundi, that the fixing of the guaranteed inter-occupational minimum wage (SMIG) will take place in the wake of these studies, and that this will be incorporated into the provisions of the Labour Code, which is being revised. The Committee also notes that: (i) in its observations, COSYBU calls for minimum wage fixing methods and implementing modalities to be established; and (ii) in this respect, the Government states that even if the current SMIG is not satisfactory, the employers fix wages in cooperation with the workers, taking account of the economic situation and the current purchasing power of the general public. The Committee recalls that the last decree fixing the SMIG was adopted in 1988. It notes that section 249(1) of the Labour Code provides that the National Labour Council must be consulted with regard to considering elements that may serve as a basis for fixing the minimum wage and conducting an annual review of minimum wage rates. It also notes that minimum wage rates can be fixed by collective bargaining. The Committee urges the Government to take all the necessary measures to re activate without delay the review process of the minimum wage rates, as provided for in section 249 of the Labour Code, and to carry out a readjustment of the SMIG in the light of this review. It also requests the Government to provide information in this respect, and also on the minimum wages applicable to various categories fixed by collective agreements in the various branches of activity or in enterprises.

Minimum Wage Fixing Convention, 1970 (No. 131) (ratification: 2006)

In order to provide a comprehensive review of the issues relating to the application of the ratified Conventions on wages, the Committee considers it appropriate to consider Conventions Nos 131 (minimum wages) and 95 (protection of wages) in a single comment.

Minimum wages

Article 4 of Convention No. 131. Periodical adjustment of minimum wage rates. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that, according to the information available, the last decree fixing the guaranteed inter-occupational minimum wage (SMIG) and the guaranteed agricultural minimum wage (SMAG) was adopted in 1991. It notes with concern the Government’s indication in its report that there has been no fixing or adjustment of minimum wages during the period covered by the report and that it does not provide information on the operation of the Standing National Labour Council (CNPT), a tripartite body whose functions include, under section 226 of the Labour Code, issuing an opinion when the SMIG and SMAG are being fixed. The Committee therefore urges the Government to take the necessary measures to review, without delay, the minimum wage rates and to adjust the SMIG and SMAG levels in the light of this review. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken in this regard, including on any opinion issued by the CNPT in this context.
Protection of wages

Article 12 of Convention No. 95. Regular payment of wages. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to provide information on the settlement of wage arrears in the public sector. It notes that the Government’s report does not contain information in this regard. The Committee recalls that the application in practice of Article 12 comprises three essential elements: (i) efficient control; (ii) appropriate sanctions; and (iii) the means to redress the injury caused (see General Survey of 2003 on the protection of wages, paragraph 368). The Committee notes that the Labour Code contains provisions regulating these three elements, but that the Code excludes public employees from its scope of application. The remuneration of public employees is regulated by Act No. 09.014 of 10 August 2009 issuing the General Conditions of Service of the Central African Public Service, which does not contain provisions implementing the three elements mentioned above. The Committee therefore once again requests the Government to provide information on the settlement of wage arrears in the public sector. It also requests the Government to take the necessary steps to ensure the regular payment of wages in this sector through the provision of efficient control, the adoption of appropriate sanctions in cases of non-observance, and the existence of means to redress any injuries caused. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken in this regard.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Democratic Republic of the Congo

Labour Clauses (Public Contracts) Convention, 1949 (No. 94) (ratification: 1960)

The Committee notes with concern that the Government’s report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments initially made in 2011.

Article 2 of the Convention. Insertion of labour clauses in public contracts. The Committee notes the adoption of Act No. 10/010 of 27 April 2010 respecting public contracts. However, it notes that this new Act, which is intended to adapt the system of the conclusion of contracts to the requirements of transparency, rationality and effectiveness which currently characterize this vital sector, does not contain any provision on the labour clauses which have to be inserted in public contracts, in accordance with this Article of the Convention. In this respect, the Committee considers it necessary to refer to its 2008 General Survey, which recalls that the essential purpose of the Convention is to ensure that, through the insertion of appropriate labour clauses in public contracts, the workers employed by a contractor and paid indirectly out of public funds enjoy wages and conditions of labour which are at least as satisfactory as the wages and conditions of labour normally established for the type of work concerned, whether they are established by collective agreement or otherwise. While noting that section 49 of Act No. 10/010 provides for the establishment of specifications determining the conditions for the execution of the contracts, which will include general administrative clauses as well as specific administrative clauses, the Committee asks the Government to take all the appropriate measures for the inclusion of provisions giving full effect to Article 2 of the Convention in the general administrative clauses contained in the specifications. The Committee hopes that, when adopting the decrees to apply the Act to public contracts, the Government will not fail to take the opportunity to bring its legislation finally into conformity with the Convention and it requests the Government to provide a copy of any new text once it has been adopted.

The Committee expects that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Dominica

Labour Clauses (Public Contracts) Convention, 1949 (No. 94) (ratification: 1983)

The Committee notes with deep concern that the Government’s report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments initially made in 2007.

Article 6 of the Convention. Legislation giving effect to the Convention. The Committee notes that the Government has never supplied any information of a practical nature concerning the application of the Convention. It would therefore be grateful if the Government would collect and transmit together with its next report up-to-date information on the average number of public contracts granted annually and the approximate number of workers engaged in their execution, extracts from inspection reports showing cases where payments have been retained, contracts have been cancelled or contractors have been excluded from public tendering for breach of the Fair Wages Rules, as well as any other particulars which would enable the Committee to have a clear understanding of the manner in which the Convention is applied in practice.

Moreover, the Committee understands that the Government has entered into a World Bank-financed technical assistance project for growth and social protection with a view to improving, among other things, the transparent operation and the efficient management of public procurement. In this connection, the Committee would appreciate receiving additional information on the implementation of this project and the results obtained, in particular as regards any amendments introduced or envisaged to public procurement laws and regulations which might affect the application of the Convention.

The Committee expects that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.
The Committee notes the observations made by the Moroccan Labour Union (UMT) and those of the Democratic Confederation of Labour (CDT), received on 17 August 2017. The Government is requested to provide its comments in this regard.

Article 2 of the Convention. Inclusion of labour clauses in public contracts. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to take the necessary measures without further delay to bring the national legislation into compliance with the Convention. The Government indicates in its report that in 2013 it adopted the legal and technical measures governing public procurement in light of the developments in the world of business and its commitments within the context of international agreements. In this context, the Government adopted Decree No. 2-12-349 of 20 March 2013 on public procurement. The Government indicates that the Decree calls for major innovations in the processes of the management of public contracts, such as unity in their regulation, the simplification and clarification of procedures, the improvement of the business climate and the reinforcement of competition. The Government adds that, in the context of the establishment of the technical file by competitors, section 25(B) of the Decree requires competitors to indicate the human and technical resources which will enable them to provide the services covered by the public procurement contract. It also refers to section 23 of Decree No. 2-14-394, of 13 May 2016, approving the list of general administrative clauses applicable to contracts for works (CCAG-T), published in the Official Bulletin on 2 June 2016. This Decree requires the entrepreneur to comply with the requirements of laws and regulations that are in force governing the recruitment and payment of workers, including the payment of a wage that is higher or equal to the statutory minimum wage established by the laws issued under the Labour Code. The Committee notes that, in accordance with section 25(A)(1)(b) of Decree No. 2-12-349 respecting public procurement, and section 519 of the Labour Code, securities are required for its practical implementation, the Government continues to refer to legislative texts that bear little relevance with the Convention as they do not provide for labour clauses of the type prescribed in Article 2 of the Convention. More concretely, the Committee notes the Government’s reference to the Factories Act and the Minimum Wages Act as instruments protecting all workers without exception, and also to the Labour and Management Agreement (LMA) 2011–13 for the building and construction industry. In particular, the Committee notes that the LMA provides for a pay scale which is higher than the minimum wage rate which was last revised in September 2012 and is now set at 5,000 Jamaican dollars (JMD) (approximately US$48) per 40-hour working week.

The Committee expects that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.
those of the Labour Code, to include all the unions in all workshops covering the reform of the regulations on public procurement and to include clauses on labour matters in all public contracts. The Committee once again notes that the provisions set out in the two texts referred to above are not adequate to ensure the application of the Convention, as they merely remind bidders that they are required to comply with the labour legislation. They are in practice pre-qualification criteria that contractors and suppliers must meet in order to comply with the requirements in force in Morocco. In its previous comments, the Committee referred to paragraphs 117 and 118 of its 2008 General Survey on labour clauses in public contacts, in which it emphasized that the Convention does not relate to some general eligibility criteria or pre-qualification requirements for individuals or enterprises bidding for public contracts. Furthermore, certification offers proof of the past performance and compliance with the legislation of bidders but, in contrast with labour clauses, it carries no binding commitment with regard to the work to be performed. The Committee reiterates that the requirement imposed by the Convention is to inform tenderers in advance, through model labour clauses in the tendering documents that, if they succeed in obtaining the contract, they will be required to apply wages and other working conditions that are at least as favourable as the highest standards established in the same district by collective agreement, arbitration award or national laws or regulations. Accordingly, noting that the regulation on public contracts still falls short of the requirements of the Convention, the Committee once again requests the Government to take the necessary steps without delay to bring the national legislation into conformity with the Convention. It reminds the Government that it may have recourse to ILO technical assistance, if it so wishes.

Minimum Wage-Fixing Machinery Convention, 1928 (No. 26)
(ratification: 1961)

Protection of Wages Convention, 1949 (No. 95) (ratification: 1960)

In order to provide a comprehensive view of the issues relating to the application of the ratified Conventions on wages, the Committee considers it appropriate to examine Conventions Nos 26 (minimum wage) and 95 (protection of wages) together.

The Committee notes the observations of the Nigeria Labour Congress (NLC) received on 8 September 2017 on the application of these Conventions.

Minimum wage

Article 1 of Convention No. 26. Scope of minimum wage protection. In its previous comments, the Committee referred to the exclusions from the National Minimum Wage Act and requested the Government to indicate any progress made with regard to extending the scope of that legislation to all workers in need of such protection. With reference to its latest comment on the application of the Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100), the Committee notes the Government’s indication that future amendments to the National Minimum Wage Act will extend its coverage to the workforce that is currently excluded. It therefore hopes that in the context of the next review of the national minimum wage this matter will be addressed and it requests the Government to provide information on progress made in this regard.

Article 4(1). System of supervision and sanctions. The Committee notes that the NLC indicates that at the state level, governments are reluctant to implement the law on the national minimum wage. The Committee requests the Government to send its comments in this regard and to indicate how it ensures that the national minimum wage is applied at all levels, including at the state level.

Article 2 of Convention No. 95. Protection of wages of homeworkers and domestic workers. Following its previous comments on this matter, the Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report that the Labour Standards Bill which extended the application of the labour legislation to homeworkers and domestic workers has been withdrawn from the National Assembly and was being reviewed by the stakeholders. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on progress made in the revision of the labour legislation and on any measures taken or envisaged to ensure the protection of wages of homeworkers and domestic workers.

Articles 6 and 12(1). Workers’ freedom to dispose of their wages and regular payment of wages. The Committee recalls that it previously requested the Government to revise section 35 of the Labour Act which allows the Minister of Labour to authorize deferred payment of up to 50 per cent of workers’ wages until the completion of their contract. In the absence of new information on this matter, the Committee recalls that such deferred payment would impede workers’ freedom to dispose of their wages and that it is inconsistent with the requirement of payment of wages at regular intervals. Therefore, the Committee requests the Government to revise section 35 of the Labour Act and to provide information on progress made in this respect. It also requests the Government to indicate in which circumstances use has been made of this provision in recent years.

Article 7(2). Work stores. The Committee notes that section 6(1) of the Labour Act provides that the Minister of Labour may, after consultation with the State Authority, give approval to an employer to establish a shop for the sale of... provisions to his workers and that no worker shall be compelled by any contract or agreement, written or oral, to purchase provisions at any shop so established. The Committee recalls that Article 7(2) also requires that where access to stores or services other than those operated by the employer is not possible, the competent authority shall take appropriate measures in order to ensure that goods and services are sold at a fair and reasonable price and only for the benefit of the workers concerned. In the absence of any provision regulating this particular situation in the Labour Act, the Committee requests the Government to indicate what measures are in place in order to ensure the application of this provision of the Convention.

Article 12(1). Regular payment of wages. The Committee notes that, in its observations, the NLC indicates that there are issues of non-regular payment of wages in several states. The Committee also notes the absence of any reply from the Government to its previous request for information on the situation of wage arrears in the country. The Committee recalls once again the importance of ensuring timely and complete payment of wages due to workers and emphasizes that accumulation of wage debts contravenes the letter and the spirit of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures, such as reinforcing supervision and strengthening sanctions, to address this issue and to provide information on the sectors and regions most affected, and the average length of time involved in late payments.

Article 14. Information on wages before entering employment and wage statements. The Committee notes that section 7(1) of the Labour Act provides that the rates of wages and methods of calculation and periodicity of the payment shall be communicated to workers not later than three months after the beginning of their employment. In addition, the Committee notes that the Labour Act does not provide for wage statements to be issued to workers at the time of each payment. The Committee recalls that Article 14 provides for workers to be informed of the applicable wage conditions before they enter employment and for wage statements to be issued to them at the time of each payment. The Committee requests the Government to indicate the measures taken to ensure full conformity with this provision of the Convention.

Rwanda

Labour Clauses (Public Contracts) Convention, 1949 (No. 94) (ratification: 1962)

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Insertion of labour clauses in public contracts. In its previous comments, the Committee recalled that it has been commenting on the Government’s failure to implement the basic requirements of the Convention for over 30 years. In this regard, the Government refers to section 44 of Law No. 13/2009 of 27 May 2009, which provides that the subcontract must contain a guarantee of payment of salary and provide respect of general conditions of work, health and safety in the workplace and other obligations of the employer in regard to the worker. The Committee once again recalls that the mere application of the general labour legislation to public procurement contracts does not produce the same legal effects as the insertion of the labour clauses expressly required under Article 2 of the Convention. Moreover, as the Committee has pointed out on a number of occasions, the legislation to which the Government refers in most cases lays down minimum standards, for instance as regards wage levels, and does not necessarily reflect the actual working conditions of workers. Thus, if the legislation establishes a minimum wage, but workers in a particular profession are actually receiving higher wages, the Convention would require that any workers engaged in the execution of a public contract – in the same area and for work of the same character – be entitled to receive the prevailing wage rather than the minimum wage prescribed in the legislation. In other terms, the application of the general labour legislation is not sufficient to ensure the application of the Convention, inasmuch as the minimum standards fixed by law are often improved upon by means of collective agreement or otherwise. The Government indicates in its report that Law No. 13/2009 of 27 May 2009 regulating labour in Rwanda is currently under review. The Committee takes note of the assurances given by the Government that the revision of the national labour legislation will provide for the insertion of labour clauses into public contracts to ensure that the workers concerned benefit from wages, hours of work and other conditions of labour, and in so doing bring the national legislation into conformity with the provisions of the Convention. The Committee hopes that the Government will take the opportunity presented by the revision of Law No. 13/2009 of 27 May 2009 to bring its national legislation into full conformity with the provisions of the Convention, particularly as regards: the determination of the terms of the labour clauses to be included in public contracts to which the Convention applies, after consultation with the organizations of employers and workers concerned (Article 2(3)); the dissemination of those clauses, by advertising specifications or otherwise, so that tenderers are aware of the terms of the clauses (Article 2(4)); the posting of notices in conspicuous places to ensure that the workers concerned are informed of the conditions of work applicable to them (Article 4(a)(iii)); and the establishment and implementation of a system of inspection and adequate sanctions, by the withholding of contracts or of payments due, for failure to apply the provisions of labour clauses (Article 5). Moreover, noting that under the Public Procurement Act of 2007, the Rwanda Public Procurement Authority (RPPA) is responsible for regulating and monitoring all public procurement operations, the Committee requests the Government to provide detailed information on any measures taken or planned by the RPPA with a view to ensuring fair labour conditions for those engaged in the execution of public contracts.
Uganda

Article 3 of the Convention. Operation of the minimum wage fixing machinery. The Committee recalls that, following the discussion of this case before the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards in June 2014, it had requested the Government to provide information with regard to the announced reactivation of the Minimum Wages Advisory Board and the subsequent fixation of a new minimum wage in the country. The Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report that a Minimum Wages Advisory Board was appointed in 2015 and that it undertook a comprehensive study of the economy with a view to providing advice to the Government on the feasibility of fixing a minimum wage in the country and the form that the minimum wage should take. The Government also indicates that the report of the Board was under discussion in the Cabinet. Despite the progress made with the reactivation of the minimum wage fixing mechanism in 2015, the Committee notes with concern that the minimum wage, which was last set in 1984, has yet to be adjusted. It therefore requests the Government to take the necessary measures to revise the level of the minimum wage without further delay. Recalling the importance of ensuring the close involvement of employers’ and workers’ organizations at all stages of this process, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the composition of the Minimum Wages Advisory Board and on the consultations undertaken with the social partners in revising the level of the minimum wage.

Ukraine

Protection of Wages Convention, 1949 (No. 95) (ratification: 1961)

The Committee takes note of the observations submitted by the Federation of Trade Unions of Ukraine (FPU) in 2017 concerning the wage arrears situation in the country, and of the response of the Government in this regard. It also takes note of the observations from the Confederation of Free Trade Unions of Ukraine (KVPU) received on 31 August and 29 October 2018, concerning the same issue.

Follow-up to the recommendations of the tripartite committee (representation made under article 24 of the ILO Constitution)

The Committee notes that in March 2017, the Governing Body approved the report of the tripartite committee set up to examine the representation submitted by the FPU, the KVPU, the Federation of Transport Workers’ Trade Unions, the Association of All-Ukrainian Autonomous Trade Unions, the Association of All-Ukrainian Trade Unions and Trade Union Associations “Iednist”, and the Federation of Trade Unions of Small and Medium Business’ Workers of Ukraine, under article 24 of the ILO Constitution (document GB.329/INS/20/2). Noting that the representation concerned the wage arrears situation in the country, the Committee will examine the follow-up given to the recommendations of the tripartite committee under Article 12 below.

Article 12 of the Convention. Regular payment of wages. Settlement of wages at termination of employment. Wage arrears situation in the country. Both the Committee in its previous comments and the Governing Body in its decision on the representation requested the Government to pursue its efforts to address the issue of wage arrears. The Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report that, while several initiatives have been introduced to tackle the problem, wage arrears in the country have increased since 2016, due to the difficult economic situation and the armed conflict in the East. The Committee also notes that the KVPU indicates that, despite the legislative arsenal in place, wages arrears have increased in recent years. The Committee recalls that the application of Article 12 in practice comprises three essential elements: (1) efficient control and supervision; (2) appropriate sanctions; and (3) the means to redress the injury caused, including fair compensation for the losses incurred by the delayed payment (2003 General Survey on protection of wages, paragraph 368).

With regard to efficient control and supervision, the Committee notes that the Governing Body requested the Government to adopt without delay all necessary measures to ensure the effective monitoring of the payment of wages by the labour inspection services. The Committee notes the information provided by the Government on the inspections conducted by the State Labour Service and its territorial directorates on the payment of wages, resulting in the issuance of instructions to remedy the situation, the referral of certain cases to law enforcement agencies and administrative courts, the imposition of sanctions, and the payment of a portion of the wage arrears. On the other hand, the Committee notes that the KVPU considers that the state bodies that control and supervise the application of the relevant legislation do not work effectively. Emphasizing the importance of properly functioning labour inspection services capable of identifying breaches of wage legislation and prosecuting offenders for the implementation of Article 12 (2003 General Survey, paragraph 369), the Committee refers to its comments on the application of Conventions Nos 81 and 129.

With regard to the imposition of appropriate sanctions, the Committee notes that the Governing Body requested the Government to adopt without delay all necessary measures aimed at the full implementation of the Convention, including sufficiently effective and dissuasive sanctions to prevent and punish infringement. In this respect, the Committee takes note of the Government’s indications that: (i) section 41 of the Code of Administrative Offences, section 265 of the Labour Code and section 175 of the Criminal Code provide for penalties for the delayed payment of wages; and (ii) a series of measures have been adopted by the Cabinet of Ministers, including the increase of the fines applicable to managers in law enforcement departments that have tolerated wage arrears, and the limitation of bonuses received by managers of public enterprises that experience wage arrears. The Government also provides detailed information on the amounts of the administrative fines and financial penalties imposed in 2016 and 2017 for delays in the payment of wages. On the other hand, the Committee notes that the KVPU considers that the legislation on the liability of employers is not applied in practice. The Committee requests the Government to provide its comments in its respect.

With regard to the means to redress the injury, the Committee notes that the Governing Body requested the Government to ensure that all workers affected by wage arrears receive appropriate compensation. The Committee notes the Government’s indications that: (i) on 22 July 2016, the Cabinet of Ministers adopted a plan of urgent measures for the payment of wage arrears (Oder No. 517-p); (ii) investigations are being conducted in follow-up to individual complaints; and (iii) a number of cases of wage arrears are referred to local courts. The Committee also notes that the FPU and the KVPU both indicate that court decisions on the payment of wage arrears are not being implemented. The KVPU further reports that workers have difficulties exercising legal remedies, in particular because of their lack of legal awareness and financial resources to cover attorney fees. The Committee requests the Government to provide its comments in this respect.

Wages arrears in the shipyard industry. The Committee notes that the FPU reports that wage arrears have further increased in one of the three shipyards referenced in the representation examined by the Governing Body. In this respect, the Government indicates that: (i) an inspection visit had been conducted in the shipyard concerned in March 2018 which evidenced violations of the legislation on the payment of wages; and (ii) following this inspection, the managing director of the shipyard was ordered to address these violations, an offence report was established, and the results of the inspection were transmitted to the regional office for a decision on the imposition of a fine. The Committee takes note of this information.

Wages arrears in the coal-mining industry. The Committee notes that the KVPU indicates that wage arrears are particularly prevalent in state-owned coal-mining enterprises. Specifically, the KVPU alleged that wage arrears situations have led to a series of protest actions in the provinces of Donetsk, Luhansk, and Volyn, including a case of self-immolation, hunger strikes, and miners’ refusals to be lifted up from the mines, causing severe health repercussions. The Committee notes that the Government did not reply to these serious allegations. The Committee requests the Government to provide its comments in this respect.

The practice of “envelope wages”. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to take measures to eliminate the practice according to which workers are forced to agree to the undeclared payment of wages “in envelopes”, resulting in the non-payment of the corresponding social contributions. Noting that the Government does not provide information in this respect, the Committee is bound to reiterate its previous request. It requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken in this respect.

Finally, the Committee notes that the Governing Body encouraged the Government to fully involve the social partners in the search for solutions to the problem of wage arrears. Recalling that bringing the accumulation of wage arrears to an end requires continuous dialogue with the social partners (2003 General Survey, paragraph 374), the Committee requests the Government to fully involve the social partners to find solutions to the issue of wage arrears and to ensure the regular payment of wages. The Committee also reminds the Government of the possibility to avail itself of ILO technical assistance in this regard.

The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken in this respect. The Committee notes that in application of the new reporting cycle for technical Conventions adopted by the Governing Body at its November 2018 session, the Government will be requested to send a report on the application of the Convention in 2019.

The Committee is raising other matters on the application of ratified Conventions on wages in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Labour Clauses (Public Contracts) Convention, 1949 (No. 94)
(ratification: 1954)

Article 2 of the Convention. Inclusion of labour clauses in public contracts. In response to previous comments, the Government reports that the limitations on the scope of Decree No. 475/005 and Act No. 18.098 to public contracts for services are in line with the special characteristics of this type of contract, which often take longer to fulfil, necessitating the establishment of labour relationships that require the recognition of special rights. On the other hand, contracts for goods include requirements that are immediately fulfilled when the provider delivers the goods or products. With regard to contracts for public works, the Government indicates that, as this type of contract involves the delivery of both goods and services, the abovementioned legislation also applies to all aspects of the contract that involve the provision of services. In this regard, the Government refers to the adoption of Decree No. 257/015 of 23 September 2015 approving the single document setting out the regulations and general conditions of public works contracts and the manual for public contracts.
and procurement procedures for goods, works and services, which incorporates Act No. 18.098 among the regulations governing public contracts. The Committee notes the clarification provided by the Government and recalls that, as explained in the Practical Guide prepared by the Office in 2008 (page 17), the Convention applies to all public contracts, whether for works (for example construction of a new highway, extension of an airport terminal), goods (for example the purchase of new uniforms for customs officers or procurement of computer hardware for a ministry) or services (for example cleaning or IT services). Furthermore, the Committee observes that the Government does not provide information on the steps taken to amend Act No. 18.098 with a view to bringing it into line with the requirements of this Article of the Convention, as the Act only requires compliance with wage rates fixed by wage boards, and not the more favourable conditions provided for in laws, regulations, collective agreements or arbitration awards. The Committee therefore once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the scope of the provisions of Decree No. 475/005 are extended to cover all types of public contracts envisaged by the Convention. The Committee reiterates its request to the Government to amend Act No. 18.098 to bring it fully into line with the requirements of Article 2 of the Convention.

Labour Clauses (Public Contracts) Convention, 1949 (No. 94) (ratification: 1969)

Article 2 of the Convention. Insertion of labour clauses in public contracts. The Government reports that a draft Labour Code has been prepared in coordination with the ILO, and that it is in compliance with international labour standards. The Government adds that issues raised in the Committee’s previous comments with regard to the insertion of labour clauses in public contracts as prescribed by Article 2 of the Convention will be brought to the attention of the Supreme Commission on Auctions and Bids. The Committee notes the Government’s indication that it requires the technical assistance of the ILO in relation to the measures to be taken to ensure that all public contracts contain labour clauses that comply with the provisions of the Convention. The Committee once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that all public contracts contain labour clauses and hopes that the Government will be soon in a position to report progress in giving full effect to this core requirement of the Convention. The Committee encourages the Government to avail itself of the technical assistance of the Office in this regard.

Minimum Wage Fixing Convention, 1970 (No. 131) (ratification: 1972)

In order to provide a comprehensive view of the issues relating to the application of the ratified Conventions on wages, the Committee considers it appropriate to examine Convention No. 131 (minimum wage-fixing) and Convention No. 95 (protection of wages) in a single comment.

Minimum Wage Fixing Convention, 1970 (No. 131)

Article 4(2) and (3) of the Convention. Consultation with and direct participation of employers’ and workers’ organizations in the minimum wage fixing system. The Committee notes that, in reply to the issues previously raised by the Zambia Federation of Employers (ZFE) and the International Organisation of Employers (IOE) regarding the lack of consultations with employers’ organizations in the process of adjusting the minimum wage, the Government indicates in its report that consultations with representative organizations of employers and workers take place through the Tripartite Consultative Labour Council (TCLC) established under the Industrial and Labour Relations Act. The Government also indicates that the concerns previously raised by the Committee in relation to section 3(1) of the Minimum Wages and Conditions of Employment Act which only provides for consultations with trade unions in the process of determining the minimum wage will be addressed in the context of the ongoing labour law reform. In particular, the Government makes reference to the draft Labour Code which would revise and consolidate various Acts including the Minimum Wage and Conditions of Employment Act which only provides for consultations with trade unions in the process of determining the minimum wage will be addressed in the context of the ongoing labour law reform. In particular, the Government makes reference to the draft Labour Code which would revise and consolidate various Acts including the Minimum Wage and Conditions of Employment Act. The proposed Labour Code would establish a Labour Advisory Committee, as an ad hoc committee of the TCLC, with a mandate to enquire into the wages and conditions of employment in any sector and to make recommendations to the Minister of Labour and Social Security on minimum wages and conditions of employment. The Committee also notes the Government’s indication that the labour law reform is carried out in consultation with social partners. The Committee hopes that, in finalizing the draft legislation in full consultation with representative organizations of employers and workers, the Government will take into account its comments and requests it to provide information on any progress made in this respect. It also requests the Government to ensure full consultation with and, as appropriate, direct participation of employers’ and workers’ organizations in the next revision of the minimum wage rates.
Protection of Wages Convention, 1949 (No. 95)

Article 12 of the Convention. Regular payment of wages. With regard to its previous comments requesting a detailed account on the problems of non-payment or delayed payment of wages encountered in the country, the Committee notes the Government’s indication that no information on this matter was available at the time of the submission of its report. The Committee is therefore bound to reiterate its request that the Government provide detailed information regarding the amount of wage arrears and the number of workers affected and to indicate which sectors of economic activity, if any, are affected by irregular payment of wages.

The Committee is raising other matters relating to the application of the Conventions on wages in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Direct requests

In addition, requests regarding certain matters are being addressed directly to the following States: Convention No. 26 (Barbados, Canada, China; Macau Special Administrative Region, Colombia, Dominica, Dominican Republic, Guinea-Bissau, Lesotho, Malawi, Papua New Guinea, Saint Lucia, Seychelles, Sierra Leone, Zimbabwe); Convention No. 94 (Antigua and Barbuda, Belize, Guyana, Malaysia: Sabah, Malaysia: Sarawak, Mauritania, Netherlands: Aruba, Netherlands: Curaçao, Nigeria, Sierra Leone, Singapore, Solomon Islands, The former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, Turkey, Uganda); Convention No. 95 (Albania, Argentina, Bahamas, Plurinational State of Bolivia, Botswana, Brazil, Central African Republic, Colombia, Democratic Republic of the Congo, Dominica, Dominican Republic, Eswatini, Grenada, Kyrgyzstan, Malaysia, Nicaragua, Russian Federation, Saint Vincent and the Grenadines, Sierra Leone, Solomon Islands, Spain, Tajikistan, United Republic of Tanzania, Uganda, Ukraine, Zambia); Convention No. 99 (Colombia, Kenya, Malawi, Papua New Guinea, Seychelles, Zimbabwe); Convention No. 131 (Antigua and Barbuda, Brazil, El Salvador, Kenya, Kyrgyzstan, The former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, Ukraine, Zambia); Convention No. 173 (Albania, Botswana, Spain, Ukraine, Zambia).

The Committee noted the information supplied by the following States in answer to a direct request with regard to: Convention No. 26 (Argentina, Bahamas, Belarus, Chile, China, Czech Republic, Ghana, Grenada, Jamaica, Luxembourg); Convention No. 95 (Barbados, Czech Republic, Saint Lucia); Convention No. 99 (Czech Republic, El Salvador, Grenada; Convention No. 131 (Albania, Chile, Eswatini, United Republic of Tanzania).

Weekly Rest (Commerce and Offices) Convention, 1957 (No. 106) (ratification: 1958)

In order to provide a comprehensive view of the issues relating to the application of the ratified Conventions on working time, the Committee considers it appropriate to examine Conventions Nos 1, 14, 30 and 106 in a single comment.

The Committee notes the observations of the Confederation of Public and Private Sector Workers (CTSP), received on 29 August 2018, the Association of Haitian Industries (ADIH), received on 31 August 2018, and the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), received on 1 September 2018.

Follow-up to the conclusions of the Committee on the Application of Standards (International Labour Conference, 107th Session, May–June 2018)

The Committee notes the discussion which took place in the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards (Conference Committee), including with regard to the impact of the 2017 Act on organizing and regulating work over a 24-period divided into three segments of eight hours (hereinafter: Act on working time) on the application of the ratified Conventions on working time. In its conclusions, the Conference Committee asked the Government to: (i) review in consultation with the most representative employers’ and workers’ organizations the conformity of the Labour Code and the Act on working time, with respect to the ratified ILO Conventions on working time; (ii) strengthen the labour inspectorate and other relevant enforcement mechanisms to ensure that workers benefit from the protection afforded by the Conventions; (iii) report to the Committee of Experts on these measures; and (iv) avail itself of technical assistance to address these matters.

The Committee notes that, at the end of the discussion in the Conference Committee, the Government recalled that the Conventions that Haiti had ratified were part of its body of domestic law under article 276-2 of the Constitution of Haiti, and took precedence over national laws in the hierarchy of standards and could be invoked without reserve before the courts. Taking note of the observations of the Committee of Experts concerning the application of the Act on working time, the Government indicated that it was planning to hold tripartite consultations to identify and overcome the main difficulties encountered in the application of the Act, and to issue orders or regulations. The Government also indicated that it was aware of the delay in finalizing the process of reforming the Labour Code. Discussions had begun at the level of the Prime Minister’s Office and would be continued within a tripartite framework, in the spirit of the San José Agreement of 21 March 2018 signed by the social partners, taking into account the Office’s recommendations.

Furthermore, the Committee notes that the CTSP, in its observations, expresses regret at the lack of progress on working time issues since the discussion in the Conference Committee. However, the CTSP indicates that discussions on the reform of the Labour Code have resumed. The Committee also notes that the ADIH confirms that tripartite discussions on the reform of the Labour Code resumed in August 2018. According to the ADIH, the Act on working time should be repealed and the employers’ and workers’ organizations should be consulted on the application of the Conventions ratified in this field. The Committee further notes that the ITUC refers to the discussion of the case during the Conference Committee and indicates in particular that: (i) the Act on working time, which liberalizes the regulations on this subject, is giving rise to serious abuses; (ii) the Act was adopted without consultation and outside the process of negotiation of a new Labour Code; and (iii) the situation is aggravated by the lack of resources for labour inspection. The ITUC refers in particular to: (i) workers in the informal economy and in domestic work who are subjected to indecent working conditions in terms of both working time and leave entitlement; (ii) security personnel and subcontracted workers in the textile sector, where there is a regrettable lack of fixed working hours and a refusal by employers to pay overtime; and (iii) workers in export processing zones who are particularly subjected to abuses. The Committee requests the Government to send its comments on all the above observations.

Lastly, the Committee notes the Government’s communication received on 30 October 2018 in which it informs the Committee that, further to the conclusions of the Conference Committee, it has requested ILO technical assistance to help it, inter alia, to submit the reports due, to strengthen the inspection services, to consolidate social dialogue with a view to pursuing social reforms, and to address the other matters raised by the Conference Committee. The Government also indicates that it hopes to receive this assistance before the next session of the International Labour Conference. The Committee hopes that this technical assistance will be made available without delay. The Committee requests the Government to provide detailed information on the results of the planned technical assistance, and also on the measures taken to ensure the effective application in law and practice of the ratified Conventions on working time.

_Article 8 of the Convention. Temporary exemptions from the normal weekly rest._ In its previous comments, the Committee noted that section 11(b) of the Decree of the Minister of Manpower and Transmigration No. KEP-102/MEN/VI/2004 on Overtime Work and Overtime Pay (the 2004 Decree) provided that when working on their weekly rest day, workers received overtime pay. Recalling that, in accordance with Article 8(3), where temporary exceptions are made in respect of the weekly rest day, compensatory rest of a total duration of at least 24 consecutive hours must be granted, irrespective of any financial compensation, the Committee requested the Government to take appropriate action in order to ensure that the national legislation would give full effect to Article 8. The Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report that based on the results of a review of the 2004 Decree, it had been agreed that the Decree would be revised to provide for compensatory time off in case of workers working on their weekly rest day. The Government also indicates that there had been no report submitted by workers to labour inspectors regarding violations of the weekly rest day and that this was due to the fact that application of the Decree in practice was arranged by an agreement between the workers and their employers. The Committee understands from the Government’s report that work during the weekly rest day is regulated through collective agreements. The Committee also notes that the 2004 Decree does not provide a list of the limited circumstances in which work could be allowed during the weekly rest day. In this regard, the Committee recalls that Article 8(1) only allows temporary exemptions from the normal weekly rest in three circumstances: (a) in case of accident, actual or threatened, force majeure or urgent work to premises and equipment, but only so far as may be necessary to avoid serious interference with the ordinary working of the establishment; (b) in the event of abnormal pressure of work due to special circumstances, insofar as the employer cannot ordinarily be expected to resort to other measures; and (c) in order to prevent the loss of perishable goods. It further recalls that, according to Article 8(2), the representative employers’ and workers’ organizations concerned, where such exist, shall be consulted in determining the circumstances in which temporary exemptions may be granted in accordance with the provisions of subparagraphs (b) and (c) above. In its 2018 General Survey on working time instruments, the Committee emphasized the importance of keeping recourse to exemptions from the general 24-hour weekly rest rule to what is strictly necessary, and for such exemptions to be authorized under clearly specified conditions, in line with Article 8(1). The Committee therefore requests the Government to ensure that, in the context of the revision of the 2004 Decree on overtime, the circumstances in which work can be authorized during weekly rest days are limited to those identified in Article 8(1) and that compensatory rest would be granted, in conformity with Article 8(3), irrespective of any financial compensation. It requests the Government to provide information on progress made in this regard. It also requests the Government to provide information on any collective agreements which would regulate the possible exemptions from the normal weekly rest.

Weekly Rest (Industry) Convention, 1921 (No. 14) (ratification: 1964)

_Article 2 of the Convention. Weekly rest entitlement. Uniformity of the weekly rest period._ In its previous comments, the Committee noted that due to the restrictive definition of the term “employee” in the Labour Ordinance Sarawak (Act A1237 of 2005), certain categories of workers do not benefit from the legal protection afforded in section 105B(1) of the Act which provides that every employee shall be allowed in each week a rest day of one whole day. In particular, it noted that this was the case for non-manual workers who are employed in industrial undertakings and whose monthly wages exceed 2,500 Malaysian ringgit (MYR) per month, as they were excluded from the definition of “employee” (section 2 and Schedule). Recalling that the Convention applies to “the whole of the staff employed in any industrial undertaking” (Article 2(1)), it requested the Government to indicate how it ensured the weekly rest entitlement of those workers who are not covered by the Labour Ordinance. The Committee also recalled that the Convention provides that the period of weekly rest shall, wherever possible, be granted simultaneously to the whole of the staff of each undertaking, and that it shall, wherever possible, be fixed so as to coincide with the days already established by the traditions or customs of the country or district (Article 2(2) and (3)). It asked the Government to specify how these principles are given effect in law and practice. The Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report that (i) for those employees excluded from the scope of application of the Labour Ordinance, their working conditions are determined by the terms and conditions of the labour contract or collective agreement; those employees are entitled to weekly rest day if it is spelled out in the contract of employment; (ii) the Labour Ordinance does not prescribe when the weekly rest day is to be taken; and (iii) the day of rest is to be determined by the employer from time to time. The Committee therefore notes with concern the absence of progress towards full application of Article 2. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that: (i) the whole of the staff employed in industrial undertakings would be entitled to weekly rest; (ii) the period of weekly rest would, wherever possible, be granted simultaneously to the whole of... the staff of each undertaking; and (iii) the weekly rest would, wherever possible, be fixed so as to coincide with the days already established by the traditions or customs of the country or district.

Article 5. Compensatory rest. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that section 105C of the Labour Ordinance Sarawak only provides for monetary compensation, and not compensatory rest, for workers performing work on their weekly rest day. The Committee recalled that Article 5 calls for compensatory periods of rest to be provided, as far as possible, to workers performing work on their weekly rest day and requested the Government to consider the possibility of amending the Labour Ordinance Sarawak in order to give full effect to the requirements of Article 5. The Committee notes that the Government indicates that there is no provision in the legislation which provides for the duty of the employer to provide for compensatory rest. In the absence of progress, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures in order to ensure that compensatory rest is granted to workers who have to work during their weekly rest day, irrespective of any monetary compensation.

Direct requests

In addition, requests regarding certain matters are being addressed directly to the following States: Convention No. 1 (Equatorial Guinea); Convention No. 30 (Equatorial Guinea); Convention No. 101 (Sierra Leone).
Occupational safety and health

Antigua and Barbuda

Occupational Health Services Convention, 1985 (No. 161) (ratification: 2002)

In order to provide a comprehensive view of the issues relating to the application of ratified occupational safety and health (OSH) Conventions, the Committee considers it appropriate to examine Conventions Nos 155 (OSH) and 161 (occupational health services) together.

General provisions

Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 1981 (No. 155)

Legislation. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the Government’s intention to adopt new OSH legislation and to repeal Division D of the Labour Code (No. 14 of 1975) (Cap. 27) concerning employment health, safety and welfare. In this respect, the Committee notes the Government’s indication in its report that no legislative measures or other measures have been taken regarding the application of this Convention. The Committee requests the Government to provide detailed information on any developments regarding its intention to adopt new OSH legislation. It further requests the Government to take the Committee’s comments below into account in the context of any reform of its OSH legislation, and to take the necessary measures to ensure that full effect is given to the provisions of this Convention. The Committee requests the Government to provide detailed information on any measures taken or envisaged in this regard.

Articles 4, 5, 7, 11(a), (b), (e) and (f) and 15 of the Convention. Formulating and implementing a national policy on OSH. The Committee previously noted that the Government had not yet taken any measures to formulate or implement a coherent national policy on OSH. The Committee once again requests the Government to formulate and periodically review a coherent national policy on OSH and the working environment in consultation with the most representative workers’ and employers’ organizations, taking into account the fields of action prescribed in Article 5, and ensuring that the functions referred to in paragraphs a, b, e and f of Article 11 are progressively carried out, and that the institutional arrangements referred to in Article 15 are made.

Articles 13 and 19(f). Protection from undue consequences of a worker who has removed themselves from a work situation which they have reasonable justification to believe presents an imminent and serious danger to their life or health. The Committee previously noted that the national legislation was silent on the issues regulated in Articles 13 and 19(f) of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure protection against undue consequences for workers who have removed themselves from a work situation which they have reasonable justification to believe presents an imminent and serious danger to their life or health and to ensure that such workers are not required to return to work situations while the imminent and serious danger is continuing.

Article 17. Measures to ensure that two or more enterprises which engage in activities simultaneously at one workplace collaborate in applying the requirements of the Convention. The Committee previously noted that there are no provisions in national legislation giving effect to this Article of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures in law and in practice, to ensure collaboration in applying the requirements of this Convention whenever two or more undertakings engage in activities simultaneously at one workplace.

Article 19(a)–(e). Arrangements made at the level of the undertaking ensuring suitable conditions for all aspects of cooperation between employers, workers and their representatives, consultations with them and their training. The Committee once again requests the Government to indicate the measures taken, in law and in practice, to give effect to Article 19(a)–(e) of the Convention.

Article 20. Cooperation between management and workers and/or their representatives within the undertaking. The Committee once again requests the Government to provide further information on the measures taken to give effect to Article 20 of the Convention.

Application in practice. Noting an absence of information in this respect, the Committee once again requests once again the Government to provide information on the application in practice of the Convention, including information on the number, nature and causes of occupational accidents and cases of diseases reported.

Occupational Health Services Convention, 1985 (No. 161)

Measures to implement the Convention. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to provide information on whether occupational health services had been established by collective agreements or as otherwise agreed upon by the employers and workers concerned, or in any other manner approved by the competent authority after consultation with the representative organizations of employers and workers concerned. The Committee notes with concern the Government’s indication that no legislative measures or other measures have been taken regarding the application of this Convention, and that there are no distinct OSH services in the country with preventive functions that are responsible for advising employers. The Committee also notes the Government’s statement that, where OSH incidents arise, the persons concerned generally seek assistance from local practitioners. Recalling that the establishment of occupational health services can be provided through laws or regulations; by collective agreements or as otherwise agreed upon by the employers and workers concerned; or any other manner approved by the competent authority after consultation with the representative organizations of employers and workers concerned, the Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that full effect is given to the provisions of this Convention in the near future. It further requests the Government to provide detailed information on any measures taken or envisaged in this regard.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Belize

The Committee notes with concern that the Government’s report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments initially made in 2015.

General observation of 2015. The Committee would like to draw the Government’s attention to its general observation of 2015 under this Convention, including the request for information contained in paragraph 30 thereof.

The Committee notes the information in the Government’s current report that the National Occupational Safety and Health (NOSH) Bill does take into consideration all the Committee’s observations as it ensures the effective protection of workers exposed to ionizing radiation in the course of their work. The Committee also notes from the Government’s report that provisions have been made in the NOSH Bill for maximum permissible doses of ionizing radiation, alternative employment (especially for pregnant women) and the prevention of occupational exposure during an emergency. Furthermore, according to available information, the NOSH Bill has not yet been adopted due to concerns that it may be burdensome to employers. The Committee notes that, in spite of its previous request, the Government has not provided a detailed report as requested by the Committee. The Committee wishes to emphasize that the indication that the new legislation is in the process of adoption does not free the Government from the obligation to ensure the application of the provisions of the Convention during the transition period and to provide such information in its report. The Committee requests the Government to supply detailed information on the application of the Convention, including new legislation, if adopted, and where it has not been adopted, the manner in which the Government ensures the application of the provisions of the Convention in practice. It also reiterates its request to the Government to respond in detail to its previous observation which reads as follows:

Articles 3(1) and 6(2) of the Convention. Maximum permissible doses of ionizing radiation. With reference to its previous comments, the Committee notes the Government’s response indicating that on 13 March 2009, the Labour Advisory Board was re-activated and that its main duty is the revision of national labour legislation. The Committee notes that the Ministry is currently in the process of identifying a consultant that will work with the Labour Advisory Board to conduct the revision of the legislation, and that comments made by the Committee will be submitted to the Board. The Committee hopes that in the course of the ongoing revision of national labour legislation due account will be taken on the exposure limits adopted by the International Commission on Radiological Protection, in order to ensure the effective protection of workers exposed to ionizing radiation in the course of their work.

Article 14. Provision of alternative employment. The Committee notes the Government’s response indicating that there is no provision in the Labour Act for the transfer of pregnant women from their work involving exposure to ionizing radiation to another job. The Committee notes, however, the Government’s statement that that the National Occupational Safety and Health Policy, adopted by Cabinet on 9 November 2004, can provide a suitable framework for drafting legislation that could make provision for such transfer and that legislation is drafted in consultation with the Labour Advisory Board. The Committee hopes that in the course of the ongoing revision of the national labour legislation due account will be taken of the need to ensure that suitable alternative employment opportunities, not involving exposure to ionizing radiations, be provided for workers having accumulated an effective dose beyond which detriment to their health considered unacceptable is to arise, as well as for pregnant women, who may be faced with the dilemma that protecting their health means losing their employment.

Occupational exposure during an emergency. The Committee notes that there is currently no provision within the Labour Act laying out the circumstances in which exceptional exposure is authorized. The Committee requests the Government, in the course of the ongoing revision of the national labour legislation, to take due account of the need to determine circumstances in which exceptional exposure is authorized, and to make protection as effective as possible against accidents and during emergency operations, in particular with regard to the design and protective features of the workplace and the equipment, and the development of emergency intervention techniques, the use of which in emergency situations would enable the exposure of individuals to ionizing radiations to be avoided.

The Committee expects that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.
Plurinational State of Bolivia

Benzene Convention, 1971 (No. 136) (ratification: 1977)

Asbestos Convention, 1986 (No. 162) (ratification: 1990)

In order to provide a comprehensive overview of matters arising in relation to the application of the ratified occupational safety and health (OSH) Conventions, the Committee considers it appropriate to examine the Benzene Convention, 1971 (No. 136), and the Asbestos Convention, 1986 (No. 162) together.

Protection against particular risks

Benzene Convention, 1971 (No. 136)

Article 4 of the Convention. Prohibition of the use of benzene as a solvent or diluent. The Committee notes the Government’s indication in its report that the use of benzene is not prohibited. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures, in accordance with Article 4 of the Convention, to prohibit the use of benzene and of products containing benzene as a solvent or diluent, except where the process is carried out in an enclosed system or where there are other equally safe methods of work.

Asbestos Convention, 1986 (No. 162)

Articles 3 and 4 of the Convention. Legislation and consultation. Referring to its previous comments, the Committee notes that the Government repeats information in its report concerning general OSH standards to which it referred previously. The Committee notes with concern that the necessary measures have not been taken to bring the legislation into conformity with Article 3 of the Convention. Moreover, with regard to the application of Article 4, the Government provides information on consultations with the social partners concerning the construction sector, but not specifically related to asbestos. The Committee once again strongly urges the Government, in accordance with Articles 3 and 4 of the Convention, to take the necessary legislative measures: (a) to prevent and control health hazards due to occupational exposure to asbestos; (b) to protect workers against such risks; and (c) to consult the most representative organizations of employers and workers concerned with regard to the measures to be taken to give effect to the provisions of the Convention.

Articles 9, 10, 11, 12 and 16. Preventive measures by law or regulation. Prohibition of the use of crocidolite and spraying. Practical measures for prevention and control. The Committee once again requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken or envisaged to ensure the application of Articles 9 and 10 (preventive measures by law or regulation), Article 11 (prohibition of crocidolite), Article 12 (prohibition on spraying) and Article 16 (practical measures for prevention and control) of the Convention.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

[The Government is asked to reply in full to the present comments in 2019.]

Central African Republic

Articles 4, 5 and 8 of the Convention. National policy. Spheres of action. Further to its previous comments, the Committee notes that the Government reiterates in its report that the Directorate of Occupational Medicine has launched a project on the national policy on occupational health and safety (OSH). While taking due note of this information, the Committee requests the Government to formulate, implement and periodically review a coherent national policy on OSH and the working environment, in consultation with the most representative organizations of employers and workers, and to take such steps as may be necessary, by laws or regulations, to give effect to this policy, in accordance with Articles 4, 5 and 8 of the Convention.

Article 7. Periodic review of the situation regarding OSH and the working environment. Further to its previous comments, the Committee notes that the Government reiterates that the situation regarding OSH and the working environment is not reviewed neither systematically nor at appropriate intervals, due to a lack of material, human and financial resources. While noting the Government’s indications concerning the lack of resources, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the situation regarding OSH and the working environment is subject to an overall review at appropriate intervals.

Articles 13 and 19(f). Situation of imminent and serious danger to life or health. Further to its previous comments, the Committee notes that the Government’s report does not contain information on: (a) the measures taken or envisaged to ensure that any worker who has removed himself from a work situation which he has reasonable justification to believe presents an imminent and serious danger to his life or health shall be protected from undue consequences of such an action, in accordance with Article 13 of the Convention; and (b) the arrangements that have been made to ensure that an employer cannot require workers to return to a work situation where there is continuing imminent and serious danger to life or health, in accordance with Article 19(f) of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to give effect to Articles 13 and 19(f) of the Convention.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

In order to provide a comprehensive view of the issues relating to the application of ratified Conventions on occupational safety and health (OSH), the Committee considers it appropriate to examine Conventions Nos 155 (OSH) and 167 (OSH in construction) together.

A. General provisions

Article 11(c) and (e) of the Convention.
Production of annual statistics on occupational accidents and diseases and application of the Convention in practice. The Committee notes the information in the Government’s report, in response to the Committee’s previous request, regarding the multiple agencies responsible for statistics on work safety and that the Government has established a monthly statistical system to clarify the scope, content and reporting of occupational accidents. The Committee welcomes the adoption of an annual statistics system for the coal mining industry as a result of the high incidence of pneumoconiosis in that sector. The Committee notes the information in the Government’s report that 26,393 cases of occupational disease were reported in 2013, among which 23,152 cases were pneumoconiosis. The Committee requests information on the concrete measures taken as a result of the statistical information collected with respect to the prevention of occupational accidents and cases of occupational disease, including specific measures taken with respect to pneumoconiosis. It also requests the Government to continue to provide information on the production of annual statistics on occupational accidents and diseases, and to continue to provide statistical information in this regard, including with respect to the number of cases of pneumoconiosis reported. It requests the Government to provide further information on the annual publication of this information, in accordance with Article 11(e) of the Convention.

Safety and Health in Construction Convention, 1988 (No. 167)

Article 8 of the Convention.
Cooperation between two or more employers undertaking activities simultaneously at one construction site. The Committee previously noted the observations of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) concerning the safety and health issues resulting from subcontracting in the construction industry, and it requested information on the implementation of this Article of the Convention in practice. In this respect, the Committee notes the information that it is the main contractor who shall be responsible for the overall occupational safety in the construction site. When the main contractor subcontracts a construction project to any other entity, it shall, in accordance with the law, explicitly stipulate their respective rights and obligations regarding work safety. The main contractor and the subcontractor shall bear joint and several liability with regard to the safety of the subcontracted project and shall share duties and responsibilities. The Committee also notes that the Government identifies certain contributing factors to the high accident rate in the construction sector, including the inadequacy of enterprise ownership, accountability and responsibility. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the application and enforcement of section 24 of the Administrative Regulations on Work Safety in Construction Projects in practice, including inspections undertaken, violations detected, and penalties applied for non-compliance. It also requests further information on how the main contractor ensures compliance with OSH measures and its implementation with respect to construction sites with several tiers of subcontracting.

Article 18(1). Work at heights including roof work. The Committee previously noted the observations of the ITUC indicating that workers often did not wear safety harnesses when working at heights so that they could work faster to finish construction projects. In this regard, the Committee notes the Government’s indication, in reply to its previous request, that pursuant to section 3.0(5) of the Technical Code for Safety of Work at Heights in Construction, workers shall be equipped with, and properly wear and use, protective appliances and clothing. The Committee further notes the information available on the website of the Ministry of Emergency Management concerning the high number of accidents in the construction sector, which identifies falls from heights as one of the major causes of occupational accidents in the sector. The Committee urges the Government to take steps to enforce safety measures for work at heights and to promote the use of safety equipment at construction sites. It requests the Government to provide information on measures taken to enforce section 3.0(5) of the Technical Code for Safety of Work at Heights in Construction in practice. The Committee also requests the Government to provide information on the number of occupational accidents reported (and their outcome) due to falls from heights.

Article 35. Effective enforcement of the provisions of the Convention and application in practice. The Committee notes the Government’s indication, in response to its previous request, that the Ministry of Housing and Urban-Rural Development has strengthened safety supervision and compels construction enterprises and sites to improve their work safety management. The Government also indicates that it has taken a number of measures to promote the application of the Convention including: carrying out national inspections of work safety in construction; prioritizing the inspection of cities, enterprises and projects with high accident rates; and undertaking research work on safety supervision. The Government further indicates that measures will be taken to address the various problems in construction safety, in particular: to enhance safety supervision and inspection; and to strengthen the investigation of accidents and the resulting penalties. The Committee notes that according to the Government, 522 occupational accidents and 648 fatalities occurred in the national municipal housing projects in 2014. According to the Government, the reasons behind these accidents include the non-standardization of the construction market; the inadequacy of enterprise ownership, accountability and responsibility; the lack of thoroughness in the elimination of hidden workplace hazards; and the inadequacy of investigations and penalties following occupational accidents. In addition, the Committee notes the information available on the website of the Ministry of Emergency Management that in 2018, the construction industry was, for the ninth consecutive year, the sector with the largest number of occupational accidents. It notes with concern that there was a 4.3 per cent increase in the number of accidents in construction between 2017 and 2018. The Committee urges the Government to strengthen its efforts to ensure the application of the Convention in practice, and to provide information on the concrete steps taken to address the safety issues identified in the construction sector. It also urges the Government to continue to take the necessary measures to ensure the provision of appropriate inspection services in the sector and penalties and to provide detailed information on any developments in this regard. The Committee further requests the Government to continue to provide information on the application of the Convention in practice, including the number and nature of the contraventions reported and the measures taken to address them, and the number, nature and cause of occupational accidents and cases of occupational diseases reported.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Asbestos Convention, 1986 (No. 162) (ratification: 1991)

In order to provide a comprehensive view of the issues relating to the application of ratified Conventions on occupational safety and health (OSH), the Committee considers it appropriate to examine Conventions Nos 155 (OSH), 161 (occupational health services) and 162 (asbestos) together.

The Committee notes the observations of the Union of Autonomous Trade Unions of Croatia (UATUC) and the Independent Trade Unions of Croatia (NHS), received in 2016.

A. General provisions

Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 1981 (No. 155)

Application of the Convention in practice. The Committee notes the information in the registry of the Croatian Institute for Health Protection and Safety at Work (CIHPSW) for 2017, and notes with concern that the total number of recorded cases of occupational diseases increased between 2016 and 2017, from 153 in 2016 to 172 in 2017. It also notes the information that, according to the Annual Report in 2017 of the labour inspectorate, there were 22 fatalities at work in 2017. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on the manner in which the Convention is applied, and to continue to provide the number, nature and cause of occupational accidents and cases of occupational disease reported.

Occupational Health Services Convention, 1985 (No. 161)

Articles 5(a), (b), (c), (d), (e), (g), (h), (i) and (k) and 6 of the Convention. Establishment and functions of occupational health services. The Committee notes the repeal of the former Occupational Safety and Health Act by the OSH Act 2014, and recalls that sections 22 and 82 of the repealed legislation gave effect to Article 5 of the Convention. The Committee notes that section 80 of the OSH Act 2014 requires the employer to provide employees with occupational medical services so as to ensure health surveillance appropriate to risks, hazards and exertions during work with a view to protecting the health of employees. Section 81 of the OSH Act 2014 further provides that occupational medicine activities, as well as the plan and programme of health protection measures, shall be prescribed by special regulations on health protection and health insurance, and that the minimum hours that the occupational medicine specialist is required to be present at the workplace shall be stipulated in an Ordinance. In this respect, the Committee notes the observations of the UATUC and the NHS, stating that, as of 2016, the Ministry of Health had not adopted regulations prescribing elements such as the minimum hours the occupational medicine specialist has to spend at the workplace, or the procedures for administering first aid. The Committee also notes the Government’s indication that the occupational medicine specialist’s participation in risk assessments at the workplace is not prescribed by national legislation, and that experience indicates that the employer rarely consults occupational medicine specialists during such assessments in practice, even though Article 5(a) of the Convention prescribes that the functions of occupational health services shall include the identification and assessment of the risks from health hazards in the workplace. In addition, section 20 of the Health Care Act (as amended) sets out types of healthcare that fall within the category of specific healthcare for workers, but provides that the content of measures on specific healthcare of workers and the method for implementing them shall be laid down by the Minister of Health in an Ordinance at the proposal of the CIHPSW, subject to prior approval by the Minister of Labour and the Pension System. The UATUC and NHS indicate, however, that these measures have not been prescribed. Noting that the OSH Act 2014 does not directly give effect to the majority of the provisions of Article 5 and requires the adoption of special regulations that have yet to be adopted, the Committee urges the Government to provide the information on the measures taken to give full effect to Articles 5 and 6 of the Convention. The Committee further requests the Government to indicate whether measures have been taken to adopt special regulations concerning occupational health activities and the plan and programme of health protection measures, as envisaged by section 81 of the OSH Act 2014, as well as the Ordinances referred to in section 20 of the Health Care Act. The Committee requests the Government to provide the list of such regulations where they have been adopted.

B. Protection from specific risks

Effective compensation of workers of the Salonit factory. In its previous comments, the Committee requested information regarding the application in practice of the Law on compensation of workers employed with Salonit d.d. (No. 84/11), pursuant to which workers employed in the Salonit factory (which manufactured asbestos products) when it declared bankruptcy in 2006 could apply for compensation within 60 days (section 2). In this regard, the Committee notes the Government’s indication in its report that the payment to the workers of compensation due to job loss was planned in instalments over two years in 2011 and 2012. The Committee notes with interest the Government’s indication that all requests for compensation have been resolved, with all 170 workers from the Salonit factory being compensated where they were eligible for compensation and had submitted a request to the Fund for Environmental Protection and Energy Efficiency. The Committee also notes the information provided by the Government regarding the establishment of an Ad-hoc Commission for Complaints to deal with appeals against the decisions taken by the Fund, consisting of representatives from the Ministry for Environmental Protection, Physical Planning and Construction, Ministry of Economy, Labour and Entrepreneurship, Ministry of Finance, Ministry of Justice and Fund for Environmental Protection and Energy Efficiency. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on any developments regarding this issue, including the number of appeals launched, and on the decisions taken by the Ad-hoc Commission for Complaints.

The Commission for Settling Claims for Compensation by Workers Suffering from Occupational Diseases Due to Exposure to Asbestos (the Commission). The Committee notes the information provided by the Government that, since the establishment of the Commission in 2007 until mid-2016, 1,318 claims had been resolved (1,072 resulting in compensation), 22 were pending before the courts, and 245 were yet to be resolved. The Committee notes the observations by the UATUC and the NHS, which provide different statistics regarding resolved and unresolved claims for compensation. The Committee also notes an absence of information regarding measures taken to raise the awareness of workers regarding possibilities for seeking redress. The Committee requests the Government to continue to ensure that all claims and requests for compensation by workers suffering from an occupational disease due to exposure to asbestos during the course of their employment are handled as expeditiously as possible. It requests the Government to provide information on progress in this respect, as well as on the measures taken to raise the awareness of such workers regarding the possibilities for seeking redress.

Application of the Convention in practice. The Committee notes the information provided by the Government regarding the registry of the CIHPSW on asbestos-induced occupational diseases, which are published annually online and includes up-to-date data and statistics on asbestos-induced diseases, broken down by geographical distribution, types of disease, gender, age, types of education and training and other metrics. The Committee notes that, according to the data of the CIHPSW, 89 cases of asbestos-induced occupational illnesses were registered in 2017, of which 79 (88.8 per cent) were men and ten (11.2 per cent) were women. In addition, the Committee notes that, according to the data of the CIHPSW, the percentage of occupational diseases caused by exposure to asbestos in 2017 was 52 per cent (89 out of 172 recorded cases). Noting the percentage, which remains high, of occupational diseases caused by asbestos, the Committee urges the Government to strengthen its efforts to ensure the medical surveillance in practice of workers that are or have been exposed to asbestos. The Committee further requests the Government to continue to provide information regarding the application of this Convention in practice, including any measures taken at the institutional level in the application of the Convention. In addition, the Committee requests the Government to provide information regarding the application in practice of the prohibition on the usage of asbestos and asbestos-containing materials in Croatia, which entered into force on 1 January 2006.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Occupational Cancer Convention, 1974 (No. 139) (ratification: 1983)

The Committee notes with deep concern that the Government’s report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments initially made in 2009.

The Committee notes that draft Regulations on the safe use of chemicals at work of 31 January 2003 are currently being discussed. It notes the Government’s statement that these draft Regulations provide protection against occupational cancer and also that it refers to the international exposure limits standard established by the American Conference of Governmental Industrial Hygienists. The Committee further notes that Chapter 3.6 of Annex 2 of the draft Regulations contains rules applicable to carcinogenicity and also notes the Government’s statement that these draft Regulations will attempt to provide for medical examinations. The Committee hopes that these Regulations will be adopted in the near future, ensuring the application of the Convention, and that they will also ensure that medical examinations or biological or other tests or investigations are carried out during the period of employment and thereafter, in accordance with Article 5 of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on measures taken to ensure the application of the Convention and to provide a copy of the Regulations, once they are adopted.

The Committee expects that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

San Marino

Article 4. Prevention and control of, and protection against, occupational hazards; Article 8. Establishing criteria for determining hazards due to exposure to air pollution, noise and vibration and exposure limits; Article 9. Technical measures to ensure that the working environment is free from any hazard due to air pollution, noise and vibration; and Article 10 of the Convention. Personal protective equipment. The Committee notes that according to the Government’s report the definition of the relevant benchmark technical standards with regard to air pollution more generally and vibration, is still pending and that the criteria determining when personal protective equipment is to be provided is directly related to these benchmark technical standards. The Committee reiterates its hopes that the technical standards that are reportedly in preparation will be adopted in the near future and asks the Government to provide information on the progress made and copies of them once they have been adopted.

Article 5. Consultations between the competent authority and the most representative organizations of employers and workers. The Committee welcomes the information provided concerning the extensive consultations held between the Department of Public Health and the most representative organizations of employers and workers on measures to be taken to improve occupational safety and health conditions in small enterprises resulting in the adoption of Decree No. 4 of 14 January 2008 revising Annex I of Decree No. 123/2001. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the practical application of this decree.

Article 11(3). Alternative employment or other measures to maintain the income of transferred workers. The Committee notes with interest the detailed guidelines on the application of the medical supervision based on Law No. 31/98 and subsequent legislation issued on 20 December 2002 following a thorough process of consultation. This guideline expressly refers to the Occupational Health Services Convention, 1985 (No. 161), and sets out detailed instructions on the way medical examinations have to be done as well as on the legal and medical obligations resulting from this examination. It also notes that workers who show reduced capacity for work in relation to the work performed have the possibility to be employed in protected activities in the state integrating sites (Cantieri Integrativi dello Stato). It also notes that according to article 9 of Decree No. 15/2006, the workers included in the Decree could be employed by the public administration in the terms fixed in the agreement between the State and the union. The Committee asks the Government to indicate if the alternative employment referred to is only for workers with disabilities or if it also covers the situation in which exposure to air pollution, noise or vibration is found to be medically inadvisable, even in cases where there is no disability. The Committee also asks the Government to provide information on cases where alternative employment or other measures to maintain the income of transferred workers have been provided in relation to this Article of the Convention.

Article 16. Penalties and inspection service. Application in practice. The Committee notes the statistical information provided by the Government containing information on the inspections carried out and the following findings: 21 infringements in large enterprises; four in medium enterprises; and one in small enterprises. The Committee requests the Government to provide information regarding the measures taken to address these trends and continue to provide detailed information on the application of the Convention in practice, including statistical information disaggregated by sex, if possible; on the number of workers covered by relevant legislation; and the number and nature of contraventions reported.

The Committee expects that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Sierra Leone

Guarding of Machinery Convention, 1963 (No. 119) (ratification: 1964)

The Committee notes with deep concern that the Government’s report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments initially made in 1997.

For a number of years, the Committee has drawn the attention of the Government to the fact that the national legislation does not contain provisions to give effect to Part II of the Convention (prohibition of the sale, hire, transfer in any other manner and exhibition of unguarded machinery) and that it does not provide for the full application of Article 17 of the Convention.
mining accounted for 18.9 per cent of the country's GDP. However, in 2018, this proportion had risen by 2.5 per cent. The Committee notes from the information provided by the Government to the ILO that in 2017, there were 2,034 occupational accidents in mines, with 936 people injured and 33 killed. The Committee also notes that in the previous year under the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81), and the Inspection (Agriculture) Convention, 1969 (No. 129), concerning several restrictions on the powers of labour inspectors. The Committee notes that during the discussions in the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards on the application of Conventions Nos 81 and 129 by the Government to continue to provide information on the incidence of occupational accidents, including fatal accidents, and also provide information on occupational diseases and dangerous occurrences.

The Committee expects that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Ukraine

Safety and Health in Mines Convention, 1995 (No. 176) (ratification: 2011)

Articles 5(1) and 16 of the Convention. Supervision of safety and health in mines, corrective measures and enforcement. The Committee notes that the State Labour Service (SLS) was created in 2014 and has assumed the functions of the former State Service of Mining Supervision. In this respect, the Committee refers its comments made this year under the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81), and the Inspection (Agriculture) Convention, 1969 (No. 129), concerning several restrictions on the powers of labour inspectors. The Committee notes that during the discussions in the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards on the application of Conventions Nos 81 and 129 by Ukraine in 2017 and 2018, some speakers indicated that the moratorium on labour inspection had particularly affected workers in mines, and that although inspections in mines had increased following a serious mining incident in March 2017 in western Ukraine (in which eight mining workers died and more than 20 were seriously injured), no information was available on the measures taken as a result of the great number of violations of safety and health standards in mines. The Committee also notes the information of 2016 contained in the observations made by the Confederation of Free Trade Unions of Ukraine (KVPU) on the application of the Protection of Wages Convention, 1949 (No. 95) received 31 August 2018, that the level of injuries at coal mining workplaces had increased by 40 per cent and the rate of fatal injuries had risen by 2.5 per cent. The Committee notes from the information provided by the Government to the ILO that in 2017, mining accounted for 18.9 per cent of the country’s work-related accidents, with 936 people were injured and 33 killed.

Referring to its comment under Conventions Nos 81 and 129, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the number of inspections undertaken in mines, the number of non-compliance issues detected and the issues to which they relate, as well as the remedial measures ordered and penalties imposed.

Articles 5(2)(c) and (d), 7 and 10(d). Procedures for investigating fatal and serious accidents and the compilation and publication of statistics. Appropriate remedial measures and measures taken to prevent future accidents by employers as a result of investigations. In its previous comment, the Committee noted that, in 2012, 3,654 workers were injured in mining accidents resulting in 125 deaths, and that 78.5 per cent of these accidents were due to organizational factors, 11.7 per cent to technical reasons and 9.8 per cent to psychological and other reasons. The Committee notes from the statistics on mining accidents provided by the Government in response to the Committee’s previous request that in 2014, in coal mines there were 2,034 occupational accidents with 99 fatalities, and in metal and non-metal mines, 220 work accidents, with 12 fatalities. The Committee also notes the information provided by the Government, in response to the Committee’s previous request concerning the procedure for the investigation of accidents, about the procedure for investigating and reporting accidents, occupational diseases and industrial incidents in the workplace, approved by Decision No. 1232 of the Cabinet of Ministers of Ukraine in 2011, which includes the obligation of employers to investigate accidents, analyse their causes and take measures to prevent future accidents. The Government also indicates that the State Labour Service undertakes a special investigation in the event of a fatal or serious accident, a group accident (an accident involving two or more people simultaneously), the disappearance of a worker while carrying out his or her duties, or the death of a worker in the workplace. However, the Committee notes that the Government has not provided the requested information on the measures taken to address the causes of accidents and the results of these measures. Since such information has not been provided, the Committee once again requests the Government to provide: (i) detailed information on the outcome of the procedures to investigate fatal and serious accidents, dangerous occurrences and disasters; (ii) information in relation to the various factors (organizational, technical and psychological) identified as causing these accidents; and (iii) information on the measures taken to address these causes and their results, including any corrective safety and health measures taken or contemplated. The Committee also requests the Government to continue to provide information on the incidence of occupational accidents, including fatal accidents, and also provide information on occupational diseases and dangerous occurrences.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.
Uruguay

Asbestos Convention, 1986 (No. 162) (ratification: 1995)

The Committee notes the observations made by the Inter-Union Assembly of Workers–Workers’ National Convention (PIT–CNT) transmitted by the Government.

Articles 3 and 5 of the Convention. Measures for the prevention and control of, and protection of workers against, health hazards due to occupational exposure to asbestos. Effective enforcement. In its previous comment, the Committee noted with regret, that although Decree No. 154/002 of 2002 prohibits the manufacture, import and commercialization of asbestos, the Government had still not given full effect to most of the provisions of the Convention. In response to this comment, the Committee notes the Government’s reference in its report to Decree No. 125/014 of 2014 concerning safety and health in construction, which the Committee observes provides for preventive measures in that sector, but makes no specific reference to asbestos. The Committee also notes the observations made by the PIT–CNT that in practice, the application of Decree No. 154/002 is not sufficiently ensured through effective controls, for instance in the reparation or substitution of the insulation of roofs. The Committee once again requests the Government to adopt the necessary measures to give full effect to the Convention, as regards the issues raised in its direct request concerning Articles 20(2) and (3) and 21(3) and below concerning the issues raised under Articles 17, 19, and 22(2). It also requests the Government to provide information on the inspections undertaken to control the prohibition of asbestos, as well as measures taken to ensure the protection of all workers who may be exposed to asbestos in the course of work, including measures taken concerning workers engaged in roofing and insulation work.

Article 17. Demolition of plants and structures containing asbestos and removal of asbestos. The Committee notes that while Chapter VII of Decree No. 125/014 concerning safety and health in construction provides for safety and health requirements with regard to demolition work, it does not contain any provisions specifically referring to asbestos. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the demolition of plants or structures containing friable asbestos insulation materials, and removal of asbestos from buildings or structures in which asbestos is liable to become airborne, are undertaken only by employers or contractors who are recognized by the competent authority as qualified to carry out such work. The Committee also requests the Government to ensure that employers or contractors shall be required to draw up a workplan before undertaking such specific demolition work, in consultation with workers or their representatives.

Article 19. Handling of asbestos waste. As the Government has once again not provided a reply on this point, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that employers shall dispose of waste containing asbestos in a manner that does not pose a health risk to the workers concerned, including those handling asbestos waste, or to the population in the vicinity of the enterprise. It also requests the Government to ensure that appropriate measures are taken by the competent authority and by employers to prevent pollution of the general environment by asbestos dust released from the workplace.

Article 22(2). Requirement for employers to establish written policies and procedures for the education and periodic training of workers on hazards due to asbestos. The Committee notes that Decree No. 125/014 concerning safety and health in construction provides, among other things, for the obligation of employers to train workers on the existing risks in workplaces in construction and on the necessary preventive measures, without making specific reference to asbestos. The Committee once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures to give full effect to Article 22(2) of the Convention by ensuring that employers have established written policies and procedures on measures for the education and periodic training of workers on asbestos hazards and methods of prevention and control.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Direct requests

In addition, requests regarding certain matters are being addressed directly to the following States: Convention No. 13 (Central African Republic); Convention No. 45 (Croatia, Guinea, Nigeria); Convention No. 62 (Central African Republic); Convention No. 115 (Kyrgyzstan); Convention No. 119 (Central African Republic, Democratic Republic of the Congo, Ghana, Kyrgyzstan, Tajikistan); Convention No. 120 (Central African Republic, Democratic Republic of the Congo, Indonesia, Kyrgyzstan, Tajikistan); Convention No. 127 (Hungary); Convention No. 136 (Plurinational State of Bolivia, Zambia); Convention No. 139 (Croatia); Convention No. 148 (China: Macau Special Administrative Region, Croatia, Finland, Hungary, Kyrgyzstan, Tajikistan); Convention No. 155 (Antigua and Barbuda, Argentina, Belize, Central African Republic, China, China: Macau Special Administrative Region, Croatia, El Salvador, Gabon, Grenada, New Zealand, Tajikistan, Zambia); Convention No. 161 (Croatia, Hungary); Convention No. 162 (Australia, Plurinational State of Bolivia, Croatia, Serbia, The former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, Uganda, Uruguay); Convention No. 167 (Plurinational State of Bolivia, China, China: Macau Special Administrative Region, Gabon, Norway, Turkey); Convention No. 170 (China, Finland); Convention No. 174 (Finland); Convention No. 176 (Turkey, Ukraine, Uruguay, Zambia); Convention No. 184 (Belgium, Ghana, Kyrgyzstan); Convention No. 187 (Argentina, Dominican Republic, France, France: New Caledonia, Indonesia, Norway, Slovenia, Turkey, Zambia).
The Committee noted the information supplied by the following States in answer to a direct request with regard to: Convention No. 13 (Croatia); Convention No. 119 (Croatia); Convention No. 120 (Plurinational State of Bolivia); Convention No. 136 (Croatia).

(ratification: 1983)

For several years, the Committee has been underlining the non-application or partial application of some of the provisions of the Convention. The Committee recalls that in previous reports the Government had expressed its intention to modernize the Workmen’s Compensation Ordinance No. 24 of 1956. The Committee notes that the Government states in its report that it will act according to the Committee’s requests. The Committee therefore hopes that the Government will take the necessary measures as described below.

Article 5 of the Convention. Compensation in the form of a lump sum. The Committee requests the Government to amend section 8 of the Ordinance so as to ensure that the compensation due in the event of accidents causing permanent incapacity shall be paid in the form of periodical payments, or exceptionally in a lump sum if the competent authority is satisfied that it will be properly utilized.

Article 7. Additional compensation for assistance by a third person. The Committee requests the Government to amend section 9 of the Ordinance in order to grant additional compensation for victims of work injuries who need the assistance of a third person in cases of permanent incapacity, and not only in cases of temporary incapacity.

Article 9. Medical and pharmaceutical treatment. The Committee requests the Government to amend section 6(3) of the Ordinance, so as not to prescribe any limit to the expenses and costs of medical treatment undergone by a worker as a result of an occupational accident for which the employer is responsible and include an express provision for coverage of related surgical and pharmaceutical costs.

Article 10. Provision of surgical appliances and artificial limbs in general. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to amend section 10 of the Ordinance so as to provide for surgical appliances and artificial limbs in all cases in which they are necessary, and not only with a view to improving the earning capacity of the person concerned.

The Committee has been informed that, based on the recommendations of the Standards Review Mechanism Tripartite Working Group (SRM TWG), the Governing Body has decided that member States for which the Convention is in force should be encouraged to ratify the more recent Employment Injury Benefits Convention, 1964 [Schedule I amended in 1980] (No. 121), or the Social Security (Minimum Standards) Convention, 1952 (No. 102) (Part VI) (see GB.328/LILS/2/1). Conventions Nos 121 and 102 reflect the more modern approach to employment injury benefits.

The Committee therefore encourages the Government to follow up the Governing Body’s decision at its 328th Session (October–November 2016) approving the recommendations of the SRM TWG and to consider ratifying Conventions Nos 121 and/or 102 (Part VI) as the most up-to-date instruments in this subject area.

Workmen’s Compensation (Occupational Diseases) Convention, 1925 (No. 18) (ratification: 2005)

The Committee notes the observations of the Confederation of Trade Unions of Armenia (CTUA) and of the Republican Union of Employers of Armenia (RUEA) communicated with the Government’s report. In order to provide a comprehensive view of the issues relating to the application of the ratified Conventions on Workmen’s Compensation, the Committee considers it appropriate to examine Convention No. 17 (Accidents) and Convention No. 18 (Occupational diseases) in a single comment.

Workmen’s Compensation (Accidents) Convention, 1925 (No. 17)

Article 11 of the Convention. Compensation of industrial accidents in the event of the insolvency of the employer or insurer. In its previous comments, the Committee made reference to the observations submitted by the CTUA in June 2013, describing the issue of about 800 workers employed by companies liquidated after 2004 who, following the adoption of Governmental Decision No. 1094-N of 2004, had been paid no compensation in case of employment accidents or occupational diseases which had occurred between 2004 and 2009. The Committee notes that, in its report, the Government states that this issue is under its attention, and it is envisioned to elaborate mechanisms that guarantee adequate compensation for persons who have a right to, and who have not, received compensation for the injuries caused by industrial accidents and occupational diseases. Recalling that, under the Convention, compensation to workers in the event of the insolvency of the employer or insurer must be paid in all circumstances, the Committee requests the...

Government to take the necessary measures without further delay to ensure that the workers concerned are duly compensated and to provide information in this regard.

Workmen’s Compensation (Occupational Diseases) Convention, 1925 (No. 18)

Application of the Convention in practice. The Committee notes the information provided by the Government, which answers the points raised in its previous direct request. The Committee requests the Government to provide up-to-date statistical information on the number of workers that were affected by the three types of occupational diseases (poisoning by lead, poisoning by mercury and anthrax infection) covered by the Convention.

The Committee has been informed that, based on the recommendations of the Standards Review Mechanism Tripartite Working Group (SRM TWG), the Governing Body has decided that member States for which the Conventions are in force should be encouraged to ratify the more recent Employment Injury Benefits Convention, 1964 [Schedule I amended in 1980] (No. 121), or the Social Security (Minimum Standards) Convention, 1952 (No. 102) (Part VI) (see GB.328/LILS/2/1). Conventions Nos 121 and 102 reflect the more modern approach to employment injury benefits and occupational diseases. In this regard, the Committee notes that in previous reports the Government had expressed the intention of introducing a mandatory social insurance scheme for occupational accidents and diseases. The Committee therefore encourages the Government to follow up the Governing Body’s decision at its 328th Session (October–November 2016) approving the recommendations of the SRM TWG and to consider ratifying Conventions Nos 121 and/or 102 (Part VI) as the most up-to-date instruments in this subject area.

Equality of Treatment (Social Security) Convention, 1962 (No. 118) (ratification: 1974)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government’s report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments initially made in 2014.

With reference to its previous comments, the Committee notes with satisfaction the adoption of the National Insurance and Social Security (Benefit) (Amendment) Regulations, 2006 (SI 2006 No. 130), by which section 59 of the principal Regulations of 1967 was replaced by the new text which permits payment of benefits abroad to persons who are residing in another country, in accordance with Article 5 of the Convention. The Government is invited to provide information in its next report on actions taken to implement the new Regulations, including any related judicial or administrative decisions.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Equality of Treatment (Accident Compensation) Convention, 1925 (No. 19) (ratification: 1978)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government’s report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments initially made in 2014.

*Article 1(2) of the Convention. Equality of treatment in relation to compensation for industrial accidents. Ever since the Convention was ratified in 1978, the Committee has been drawing the Government’s attention to the need to amend section 29 of Decree No. 57-245 of 1957 concerning compensation for industrial accidents and occupational diseases in order to bring the national regulations into conformity with Article 1(2) of the Convention, according to which the nationals of States that have ratified the Convention and their dependants must receive the same treatment as Djibouti grants to its own nationals in respect of accident compensation. Under the terms of the Decree No. 57-245 of 1957, unlike nationals, foreign workers injured in industrial accidents who transfer their residence abroad no longer receive a periodic payment but a lump-sum payment equal to three times the periodic payment they received previously. The Committee notes that the Government refers in its report to Act No. 154/AN/02/4ème-L of 31 December 2002 codifying the functioning of the Social Protection Institute (OPS) and the general retirement scheme for employees, indicating that the Act does not prescribe different treatment for national and foreign employees and their dependants with regard to compensation for industrial accidents and, in accordance with the Convention, does not impose any residence requirement for foreign workers to be entitled to benefits. The Committee observes, however, that the abovementioned Act does not primarily deal with periodic payments for industrial accidents but rather with the issue of those payments being combined with retirement benefits. It further observes that, in its report on the Workmen’s Compensation (Accidents) Convention, 1925 (No. 17), the Government continues to refer to the provisions of Decree No. 57-245 of 1957 in the context of the regulations governing periodic payments for industrial accidents. In view of the above, the Committee again requests that the Government amend section 29 of Decree No. 57-245 of 1957 so as to bring the national legislation into full conformity with Article 1(2) of the Convention.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Sickness Insurance (Industry) Convention, 1927 (No. 24) (ratification: 1978)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government’s report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments initially made in 2014.
Article 1 of the Convention. Setting up a system of compulsory sickness insurance. The Committee notes that Act No. 212/AN/07/5ème-L establishing the National Social Security Fund (CNSS) provides that new complementary social instruments such as sickness insurance will be instituted by means of regulations (section 5 of the Act). It also notes the adoption of Act No. 196/AN/13/6ème-L of 20 February 2013 extending treatment coverage to self-employed workers and of Decree No. 2013-05/S/P.R/MTRA of 11 April 2013 establishing CNSS registration procedures and contributions for self-employed workers. The Government states that these items of legislation are the precursor to establishing a universal sickness insurance system in Djibouti in the near future. The Committee hopes that once this insurance system is established it will cover the payment of sickness benefits to insured persons, which are currently covered by employers, contrary to the terms of the Convention. It requests the Government to keep it informed of any developments regarding the introduction of a universal sickness insurance system.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Invalidity Insurance (Industry, etc.) Convention, 1933 (No. 37)
(ratification: 1978)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government’s report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments initially made in 2014.

Establishment of a compulsory invalidity insurance scheme. With reference to its observation relating to the Sickness Insurance (Industry) Convention, 1927 (No. 24), the Committee recalls that the national social protection system has been undergoing restructuring for a number of years, which involves the merger of various insurance funds in the interests of more efficient management. In this context, although the social protection system has no specific branch for invalidity benefits, the Government indicates that Act No. 154/AN/02/4ème-L of 31 January 2002 codifying the operation of the Social Protection Institute (OPS) and the general retirement scheme for salaried employees, contains several provisions that authorize workers aged 50 years and over who are affected by a permanent physical or mental impairment to claim an early retirement pension when they have accrued a minimum of 240 contribution months (section 60 ff.). The Committee emphasizes that, even though it is justified in the context of early retirement, the fixing of a minimum age at which a person can receive invalidity benefit, as set forth by Act No. 154, is in breach of Article 4 of Convention No. 37 and the Invalidity Insurance (Agriculture) Convention, 1933 (No. 38). Moreover, the length of the qualifying period for entitlement to invalidity benefit must not, according to Article 5(2) of Conventions Nos 37 and 38, exceed 60 contribution months. In view of the failure of these provisions to give effect to the main requirements of Conventions Nos 37 and 38, the Committee requests the Government to carry out the feasibility studies needed to establish an invalidity insurance scheme.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Guinea

Equality of Treatment (Social Security) Convention, 1962 (No. 118)
(ratification: 1967)

The Committee notes with concern that the Government’s report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments initially made in 2015.

Article 5 of the Convention. Payment of benefits in the case of residence abroad. Referring to its previous comments, the Committee notes with interest the conclusion in 2012 of the Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS) General Convention on Social Security, which aims in particular to enable migrant workers who have worked in one of the 15 ECOWAS member States to exercise their right to social security in their country of origin through the coordination of national social security systems. However, since Cabo Verde is the only other ECOWAS member State that has ratified Convention No. 118, the Committee requests the Government once again to indicate whether, as it understands from its reading of section 91 of the Social Security Code, nationals of any State that has accepted the obligations of the Convention for the corresponding branch should in principle be able to claim payment of their benefits in the case of residence abroad. If so, the Committee requests the Government to indicate whether a procedure for the transfer of benefits abroad has been established by the National Social Security Fund to meet any requests for the transfer of benefits abroad. In addition, the Committee requests... the Government to clarify whether any Guinean nationals transferring their residence abroad would also be entitled to have their benefits transferred abroad, in accordance with the principle of equal treatment established under Article 5 of the Convention.

Article 6. Payment of family benefit. Referring to the comments it has been formulating for many years regarding the provision of family allowances in respect of children residing abroad, the Committee notes that, under section 94(2) of the Social Security Code, to be entitled to family benefit, dependent children “must reside in the Republic of Guinea, subject to the special provisions of the international Conventions on social security of the International Labour Office, reciprocal agreements or bilateral or multilateral agreements”. With respect to reciprocal agreements or bilateral or multilateral agreements, the Committee recalls that to date Guinea has concluded no agreement of this sort for the payment of family allowances in respect of children residing abroad. Regarding the special provisions of the ILO Conventions, it recalls that under Article 6 of Convention No. 118 any State which has accepted the obligations of the Convention for branch (i) (family benefit) must guarantee payment of family allowances both to its own nationals and to the nationals of any other Member which has accepted the obligations of the Convention for that branch, as well as for refugees and stateless persons, in respect of children who reside on the territory of any such State, under conditions and within limits to be agreed upon by the States concerned. The Committee notes that the Government’s report does not provide any information in this respect and hopes that the Government will be able to confirm formally in its next report that the payment of family benefit will also be extended to cover insured persons up to date with their contributions (whether they are nationals, refugees, stateless persons or nationals of any other States which have accepted the obligations of the Convention for branch (i) whose children reside in the territory of one of these States and not in Guinea. The Committee also requests information as to how the condition of residence is dispensed with in these cases for the application of section 99(2) of the Code, which only recognizes as dependent those children “that live with the insured person”, and also for section 101, which makes payment of family allowances subject to an annual medical examination of the child, up to the age where he or she comes under the school medical service, and the regular medical care for beneficiaries of school age attending courses in educational or vocational training establishments.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee expects that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Workmen’s Compensation (Occupational Diseases) Convention (Revised), 1934 (No. 42) (ratification: 1955)

The Committee notes the observations of the Confederation of Public and Private Sector Workers (CTSP), received on 30 August 2017 and 29 August 2018, and the observations of the Association of Haitian Industries (ADIH), received on 31 August 2018, concerning the application of ratified Conventions on social security. The Committee notes with deep concern that the Government’s reports for Conventions Nos 12, 17, 24, 25 and 42 have not been received. While it is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments initially made in 2012, the Committee notes the Government’s communication received on 30 October 2018 in which it informs the Committee that, further to the conclusions of the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards, it has requested ILO technical assistance with a view to helping in the presentation of the reports due, strengthening the inspection services, consolidating social dialogue for the continuation of social reforms, and addressing the other points raised by the Conference Committee. The Government adds that it hopes to receive the requested assistance before the next session of the International Labour Conference. The Committee hopes that this technical assistance will be provided without delay and that it will give rise to timely delivery of all outstanding reports. It also requests the Government to send its comments on the observations of the CTSP and the ADIH.

The Committee notes the observations made by the Confederation of Public and Private Sector Workers (CTSP), received on 31 August 2016, by which it reiterated most of the issues raised previously, indicating that, even though some state efforts to increase the coverage of the insurance have been visible, these were focused on the capital city, leaving apart the people living in rural areas.

The Committee notes that on 15 September 2015 the Confederation of Public and Private Sector Workers (CTSP) provided its observations concerning the application of the Conventions under examination. The CTSP indicates that the affiliation of employers to the Employment Injury, Sickness and Maternity Insurance Office (OFATMA), although a legal obligation, is a reality in practice for less than 5 per cent of workers. In the specific case of agricultural workers, the CTSP considers that it is necessary to take urgent measures to extend effective coverage by the OFATMA, as they represent the majority of workers in the country and produce 30 per cent of the gross domestic product, and yet they remain without any social protection.

The Committee is fully aware that the Government indicated in its last report that the Act of 28 August 1967, establishing the OFATMA, covers all dependent workers irrespective of their sector of activity, but that the absence of formal agricultural enterprises means that most agricultural workers are engaged in family subsistence agriculture and are excluded from the scope of the social security legislation. Nevertheless, the Committee observes that the application of the existing legislation appears to give rise to difficulties, even with regard to workers in the formal economy. Moreover, the sickness insurance scheme has never been established, even though the Government has indicated that it is pursuing its efforts to establish progressively a sickness insurance branch covering the whole of the population and to enable OFATMA to regain the trust of the population.

With a view to better assessing the challenges facing the country in the application of the social security Conventions and providing better support for the initiatives taken in this respect, the Committee requests the Government to provide further information in its next report concerning the functioning of the employment injury scheme administered by OFATMA (numbers covered, amount of contributions collected annually, number of employment accidents and occupational diseases recorded, amount of benefits paid for employment injury). Please include information on strategies for increasing participation in and utilization of OFATMA services by the eligible populations.

International assistance: The Committee notes that the Government is receiving substantial support from the ILO and the international community, particularly in the field of labour inspection. Moreover, since 2010, the ILO and the United Nations system as a whole have made available to the Government their expertise for the establishment of a social protection floor. The Committee considers that it is necessary for the Government to envisage as a priority the establishment of mechanisms to provide the population as a whole, including informal workers and their families, with access to essential health care and a minimum income when their earnings capacity is affected as a result of sickness, employment accident or occupational disease. In this regard, the International Labour Conference adopted the Social Protection Floors Recommendation (No. 202) in 2012, with a view to the establishment of basic social security guarantees to prevent and alleviate poverty, vulnerability and social exclusion. In this connection, the implementation of Conventions and of Recommendation No. 202 should continue in parallel, seeking and exploiting synergies and complementarity.

The Committee recalls that the establishment of a social protection floor was included by the Haitian Government as one of the elements of the Action Plan for National Recovery and Development of Haiti, adopted in March 2010. However, the Government has not yet provided any information on the measures adopted to achieve this objective. The Committee notes, among other matters, the conclusion in 2010 of a national programme for the promotion of decent work which includes an item dedicated to the establishment of the social protection system under the social security Conventions ratified by Haiti.

Conclusions and recommendations of the Standards Review Mechanism. The Committee notes that, at its 328th Session in October 2016, the Governing Body of the ILO adopted the conclusions and recommendations formulated by the Standards Review Mechanism Tripartite Working Group (SRM TWG), recalling that Conventions Nos 17, 24, 25 and 42 to which Haiti is a party are outdated and charging the Office with follow-up work aimed at encouraging States party only to these Conventions to ratify the following instruments as they represent the most up-to-date standards:

- As regards employment injury: the Employment Injury Benefits Convention, 1964 [Schedule I amended in 1980] (No. 121) and/or the Social Security (Minimum Standards) Convention, 1952 (No. 102) and accept the obligations in its Part VI.

- As regards medical care and sickness benefit: the Medical Care and Sickness Benefits Convention, 1969 (No. 130) and/or the Social Security (Minimum Standards) Convention, 1952 (No. 102), and accept the obligations in its Parts II and III.

The Committee expects that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Workmen’s Compensation (Accidents) Convention, 1925 (No. 17) (ratification: 1964)

Legislative reform. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the Government’s indication that it was in the process of amending the Work Injury Benefits Act, 2007 (WIBA, 2007). It notes that the Government indicates in its report that it has put effort towards development of a new legislation that will address the gaps in the current law and replace the WIBA and that the Bill is yet to be tabled in Parliament. The Committee hopes that this new piece of legislation will take duly into account the comments it has been providing in order to give full application to the Convention.

Article 5 of the Convention. Payment of compensation for permanent incapacity or death in the form of periodical payments. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that, in accordance with section 30 of the WIBA, 2007, an employee who suffers permanent disablement is entitled to a lump-sum payment equivalent to 96 months’ earnings. It invited the Government to review the WIBA, 2007, so as to compensate victims of occupational accidents suffering permanent incapacity, or their dependants in cases of fatal accidents, with periodical payments and to reserve the compensation in the form of a lump sum only if the competent authority is satisfied that the lump sum will be properly utilized. The Committee notes that the Government does not indicate whether the new Bill will regulate a compensation in the form of a periodical payment. It therefore requests the Government to take advantage of the ongoing legislative reform to ensure full compliance with Article 5 and to provide information on progress made in the reform.

Articles 9 and 10. Free of charge medical, surgical and pharmaceutical aid. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that section 47 of the WIBA, 2007, provides that an employer must defray reasonably incurred medical expenses which occurred after an occupational accident. The Government had indicated in previous reports that the term “reasonable expenses” would be defined on the occasion of the review of the WIBA, 2007, so as to include all medical intervention necessary. The Committee welcomes the Government’s indication that Clause 55 of the Bill would contain a list of the expenses incurred by an employee as the result of an accident arising out of, and in the course of, the employee’s employment to be defrayed by the employer.

Article 11. Compensation of industrial accidents in the event of the insolvency of the employer or insurer. The Committee notes that the WIBA, 2007, does not provide arrangements aiming to ensure in all circumstances, in the event of the insolvency of the employer or insurer, the payment of compensation to workers who suffer personal injury due to industrial accidents. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures in the context of the ongoing legislative reform to ensure that provision is made for the payment of compensation to the victims of occupational accidents in case of insolvency of the employer.

The Committee has been informed that, based on the recommendations of the Standards Review Mechanism Tripartite Working Group (SRM TWG), the Governing Body has decided that member States for which the Convention is in force should be encouraged to ratify the more recent Employment Injury Benefits Convention, 1964 [Schedule I amended in 1980] (No. 121), or the Social Security (Minimum Standards) Convention, 1952 (No. 102) (Part VI) (see GB.328/LILS/2/1). Conventions Nos 121 and 102 reflect the more modern approach to employment injury benefits. The Committee therefore encourages the Government to follow up the Governing Body’s decision at its 328th Session (October–November 2016) approving the recommendations of the SRM TWG and to consider ratifying Convention No. 121 and/or Convention No. 102 (Part VI) as the most up-to-date instruments in this subject area.

Follow-up to the conclusions of the Committee on the Application of Standards (International Labour Conference, 107th Session, May–June 2018)

The Committee notes the discussion that took place in the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards (CAS) in June 2018 concerning the application of the Convention. The Committee recalls that the discussion in the CAS has been based upon long-standing issues raised and comments made by the Committee, urging the Government to take the necessary measures with a view to re-establishing the principle of equal treatment between foreign and national workers in case of employment injury. The Committee observes that the CAS, in its conclusions, welcomed the Government’s stated commitment to ensuring the Convention’s requirement for equal treatment of migrant workers and national workers. The Committee observes that the CAS urged the Government to: (i) take steps to develop and communicate its policy for governing the recruitment and treatment of migrant workers; (ii) take immediate steps to conclude its work on the means for reinstating the equality of treatment of migrant workers, in particular by extending the coverage of the Employees’ Social Security Scheme (ESS) to migrant workers in a form that is effective; (iii) engage in genuine consultations with employers’ and workers’ organizations to develop laws and regulations that ensure the removal of discriminatory practices between migrant and national workers, in particular in relation to workplace injury; (iv) adopt special arrangements with other ratifying Member States to overcome the administrative difficulties of monitoring the payment of compensation abroad; and (v) take necessary legal and practical measures to ensure that migrant workers have access to medical care in the case of workplace injury. The CAS called on the Government to accept an ILO direct contacts mission with a view to implementing these recommendations and to develop mechanisms for overcoming the practical issues affecting the implementation of the domestic social security scheme to migrant workers. The Committee recalls that, in its previous comments, it has repeatedly drawn the attention of the Government to the fact that, since 1993, the national legislation provided for foreign workers employed in Malaysia for up to five years, to be transferred from the ESS, which provides for periodical payments to victims of industrial accidents, to the Workmen’s Compensation Scheme (WCS), which guarantees only a lump-sum payment of a significantly lower amount. The Committee notes that in its reply the Government states that it is taking serious efforts to shift the protection of foreign workers from the WCS to the ESS to adhere to the principle of equal treatment for workers. The Committee notes the Government states it has agreed to extend the ESS, which will be under the Social Security Organization (SOCSO), to foreign workers. To this purpose, a transition period is envisaged to ensure the smooth extension, in order to to establish implementation mechanisms, databases, roadmaps and engagement sessions with stakeholders and social partners. The Committee notes the Government’s indication, that the transition period is planned to last, at a maximum, for three years, due to three main factors, which are the following: (i) the SOCSO has just been recently tasked with the implementation of Employment Insurance System, which needs certain time for the funds to be at a sustainable stage, and to ensure the smooth operation of administrative matters related to Employment Insurance System. In addition, the existing Social Security Act 1969 will need to undergo certain amendments in its provision; (ii) existing contractual obligation with the insurance panels and system provider of the c-compensation scheme; and (iii) providing employers with ample time to adjust to the changes. that will occur with the shifting from the WCS to the ESS. The Committee welcomes the statement that the Government stands ready to take immediate action, including further deliberation and engagement with social partners from trade unions and employers’ federation. The Committee welcomes the intention of the Government to seek technical assistance from the ILO. The Committee welcomes the Government has accepted the direct contacts mission which will take place in 2019. The Committee firmly hopes that the Government will take advantage of the direct contacts mission with a view to implementing the conclusions by the CAS as well as its long-standing requests, so as to guarantee to foreign workers the fundamental right to equality of treatment with national workers in case of employment injury.

With reference to its previous observation, the Committee notes the reply of the Government that, contrary to Article 7 of the Convention, no provision is made in national legislation for the payment of additional compensation for injured workers requiring the constant help of another person; and that compensation for all expenses (medical, surgical or pharmaceutical, etc.) is limited to 20,000 East Caribbean dollars, whereas no such ceiling is foreseen in the Convention in case of occupational accident (Articles 9 and 10 of the Convention). The Committee regrets to note that since the entry into force of the Convention in 1980 the Government has been unable to bring the provisions of the national legislation in conformity with Articles 7, 9 and 10 of the Convention. In this situation, the Committee deems it necessary to ask the Government to undertake an actuarial study which will determine the financial implications of the introduction into the national insurance scheme of the benefits guaranteed by these Articles of the Convention. The Committee wishes to remind the Government of the possibility to avail itself of the technical assistance of the Office in this respect.

The Committee expects that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Workmen’s Compensation (Accidents) Convention, 1925 (No. 17)
(ratification: 1961)

The Committee notes with deep concern that the Government’s report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments initially made in 2004.

The Committee notes that the country is mentioned in a special paragraph of the report of the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards for failure to supply information in reply to comments made by the Committee. The Committee expects that the Government will be able to report on the application of Convention No. 17 soon and recalls that the technical assistance of the Office is at its disposal.

The Committee expects that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Workmen’s Compensation (Accidents) Convention, 1925 (No. 17)
(ratification: 1962)

Equality of Treatment (Accident Compensation) Convention, 1925 (No. 19)
(ratification: 1962)

The Committee notes with interest that the Government indicates in its report that the Workers Compensation Fund (WCF) is now operational and that the Workers’ Compensation Regulations, 2016, have been adopted. In order to provide a comprehensive view of the issues relating to the application of the ratified Conventions on workmen’s compensation, the Committee considers it appropriate to examine Conventions Nos 17 (accidents) and 19 equality of treatment (accident compensation) in a single comment.

Workmen’s Compensation (Accidents) Convention, 1925 (No. 17)

Article 5 of the Convention. Lump-sum compensation in the event of permanent incapacity. The Committee noted in its previous comments that, according to section 49 of the Workers Compensation Act No. 20 of 2008, where a pension is less than the prescribed amount per month, the Director-General of the WCF may decide to pay a lump sum in lieu of the monthly pension for permanent disablement granted in accordance with section 48 of the Act. The Committee notes the Government’s indication that the Workers’ Compensation Regulations, 2016, have been adopted with a view to providing guidance for the implementation of the Act.

Article 6. Payment of compensation. In its previous comments, the Committee asked the Government to explain how and by whom the compensation is paid after the first month to injured workers. The Committee notes that the Government indicates that, under sections 46(3) and 46(4) of the Workers Compensation Act, employers are liable for providing to the injured employee the compensation for temporary incapacity for the first month, and that thereafter all payments will be provided by the Fund. Furthermore, the Committee notes that the Government states that, in any case, the Fund has put in place a mechanism to ensure that such payments can be provided directly by the Fund including for the first month.

Article 7. Additional compensation. The Committee noted in its previous comments that the right to additional compensation in cases in which the injured worker must have the constant help of another person should not depend upon an administrative decision of the WCF, as provided for by section 51 of the 2008 Act. The Committee notes the information provided by the Government, informing that the Regulations, 2016, provide that the Director-General of the WCF will determine constant care grants through Guidelines, as foreseen by regulation 40(1) of the Workers’ Compensation Regulations 2016. The Committee also notes that through the Public Service Social Security Fund Act, 2018, section 40(2) of the National Social Security Fund Act, 1997, which provided for an additional allowance of 25 per cent of the employment injury benefit to the helper in case the recipient of permanent disability benefit for employment injury needed the constant help of another person, has been repealed. The Committee asks the Government to take the necessary measures to include the legal rules concerning constant attendant care grants for temporary and permanent incapacity in the forthcoming Guidelines in order to give full effect to this provision of the Convention.

Articles 9 and 10. Medical aid free of charge. Artificial limbs and appliances. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that according to section 62 of the Workers Compensation Act, 2008, the Fund shall pay the reasonable costs of medical aid required by an occupational accident for a maximum period of two years. The Fund may also pay the additional costs for further medical aid when it may reduce the incapacity. The Committee notes that the Government indicates that, under section 4 of the Act, a definition of medical aid including medical, surgical, hospital treatment, skilled nursing services as well as the supply and repair of any prosthesis or any devices necessitated, and ambulance service, is provided. The Committee also notes that the Government states that the Fund will provide surgical appliances, artificial limbs and pharmaceutical aid as part of the medical rehabilitation of the injured employee. The Government adds that the Committee’s comments will be taken into account for the formulation of the Guidelines to be issued by the Director-General of the Fund, in accordance with the Workers’ Compensation Regulations, 2016. The Committee asks the Government to ensure that the Guidelines will include the definition of reasonable medical costs, as well as the renewal of artificial limbs and surgical appliances to be provided free of charge.

Article 11. Insolvency of the insurer. The Committee notes the information provided by the Government concerning the insolvency of the employer or insurer, which acknowledges that the Government is the guarantor in case of insolvency of the Fund, also by virtue of a constitutional obligation.

The Committee has been informed that, based on the recommendations of the Standards Review Mechanism Tripartite Working Group (SRM TWG), the Governing Body has decided that member States for which Convention No. 17 is in force should be encouraged to ratify the more recent Employment Injury Benefits Convention, 1964 [Schedule I amended in 1980] (No. 121), or the Social Security (Minimum Standards) Convention, 1952 (No. 102) (Part VI) (see GB.328/LILS/2/1). Conventions Nos 121 and 102 reflect the more modern approach to employment injury benefits. The Committee therefore encourages the Government to follow up the Governing Body’s decision at its 328th Session (October–November 2016) approving the recommendations of the SRM TWG and to consider ratifying Conventions Nos 121 and/or 102 (Part VI) as the most up-to-date instruments in this subject area.

Equality of Treatment (Accident Compensation) Convention, 1925 (No. 19)

Article 1(2) of the Convention. Payment of accident compensation abroad. The Committee asks the Government to specify how the transfer abroad of cash benefits in case of industrial accidents is regulated as regards both nationals and foreigners and their dependants so as to ensure that nationals of other member States who have ratified the Convention receive the same treatment as the Government grants to its own nationals.

With respect to the legislation applicable in Zanzibar, the Committee asks the Government whether it envisages to amend the Workmen’s Compensation Act No. 15 of 1986 of Zanzibar which puts the liability for the payment of compensation directly on the employer, so as to harmonize it with the Workers Compensation Act No. 20 of 2008, which provides a social insurance scheme in case of employment injuries and occupation diseases.

Direct requests

In addition, requests regarding certain matters are being addressed directly to the following States: Convention No. 12 (Angola, Dominica, Guinea-Bissau); Convention No. 17 (China: Macau Special Administrative Region, Djibouti, Guinea-Bissau, Kyrgyzstan, Uganda); Convention No. 18 (Angola, Djibouti, Guinea-Bissau); Convention No. 19 (Dominica, Guinea-Bissau, Indonesia, Saint Lucia); Convention No. 42 (Solomon Islands); Convention No. 102 (Barbados); Convention No. 118 (Guinea); Convention No. 121 (Guinea); Convention No. 128 (Barbados); Convention No. 157 (Kyrgyzstan).
The Committee noted the information supplied by the following States in answer to a direct request with regard to:

- Convention No. 12 (Antigua and Barbuda, Gabon, United Republic of Tanzania);
- Convention No. 19 (China, China: Macau Special Administrative Region, Gabon, Kenya);
- Convention No. 42 (Italy).
Maternity protection

Equatorial Guinea

Maternity Protection Convention (Revised), 1952 (No. 103) (ratification: 1985)

The Committee notes with deep concern that the Government’s report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments initially made in 2004.

With reference to its comments on the application of Article 6 of the Convention, the Committee notes that, like Act No. 8/1992, sections 111 and 112 of Act No. 2/2005 of 9 May 2005 on public servants allow women workers to be dismissed for gross misconduct following the appropriate disciplinary procedure. In previous reports, the Government indicated its intention to amend the legislation so that any misconduct by pregnant workers would give rise to a disciplinary procedure at the end of the period of maternity or postnatal leave. The Committee hopes that the Government will take all the necessary measures to establish a formal prohibition on giving a public servant her notice of dismissal during her absence on maternity leave or at such time that the notice would expire during such absence.

The Committee expects that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.
Social policy

Jamaica

Social Policy (Basic Aims and Standards) Convention, 1962 (No. 117) (ratification: 1966)

The Committee notes that the Government’s report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments initially made in 2013.

Parts I and II of the Convention. Improvements of standards of living. The Committee notes the Government’s report received in October 2013, which indicates that the principal objective in the planning of economic development continues to be the realization of the improvement of standards of living. Moreover, the Government mentions that, while small groups of people are actually experiencing an improvement, the majority is experiencing a reversal or downturn in their standards of living. The Government attributes this situation to the stringent measures imposed by the International Monetary Fund and the global economic downturn. As regards the means employed to aid independent producers to reach a higher standard of living, the Government refers to the provision of grants, training and markets for products. Furthermore, there are programmes to assist in the mitigation of the difficulties experienced by independent producers when unable to maintain a minimum standard of living. The Committee invites the Government to provide, in its next report, up-to-date information indicating how the “improvement of standard of living” is regarded as “the principal objective in the planning of economic development” in accordance with Article 2 of the Convention. Please also supply detailed information on the measures taken to promote cooperatives and to improve the standards of living for workers in the informal economy (Articles 4(e) and 5).

Part IV. Remuneration of workers. Protection of wages. The Government indicates that there is no legislation directly aiming to ensure the proper payment of all wages earned. Furthermore, with regard to the measures contemplated in order to give effect to Article 11(8) of the Convention, the Government reiterates the information provided in its previous report. The Committee recalls that, for some years now, the Government has been requested to report on the measures taken or envisaged in order to give effect to various subparagraphs of Article 11. The Committee asks the Government to provide information in its next report on the measures taken to facilitate the supervision necessary to ensure the proper payment of all wages earned, and the keeping by employers of registers to ensure the issue to workers of statements of their wage payments. The Committee requests the Government to provide in its next report specific information on the policies, practices or any other measures adopted indicating, where appropriate, the relevant provisions of legislation and administrative regulations which ensure the proper payment of all wages earned, as provided under each of the subparagraphs of Article 11 of the Convention.

Advances on wages. In response to the Committee’s previous comments, the Government indicates that, at this time, it has not taken nor is contemplating taking any measures in order to regulate the advances on wages in the private sector. The Committee recalls that, under Article 12 of the Convention, not only does the manner of repayment of advances on wages have to be regulated, but the maximum amounts of advances have to be determined and any advance in excess of the amount laid down has to be made legally irrecoverable. The aforementioned obligation covers both the public and private sectors. The Committee again requests the Government to indicate, in its next report, the measures taken or contemplated to regulate the advances on wages in accordance with Article 12 of the Convention.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Nicaragua

Parts I and II of the Convention. Improvement of standards of living. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to provide information on the results achieved by the National Human Development Plan (PNDH 2012–16) and the other initiatives adopted with a view to ensuring the improvement of the living standards of the population. In this regard, the Committee notes the adoption, in February 2018, of the Country Partnership Framework for Nicaragua for the period 2018–22 with the World Bank, to reduce poverty and promote prosperity for more Nicaraguans. The main objectives of the Framework are to invest in human resources, particularly with regard to groups in vulnerable situations (women, young people, small-scale producers who practise subsistence agriculture, and indigenous communities and communities of African descent in rural areas such as the Corredor Seco and Caribbean regions, in which the majority of people live in poverty and extreme poverty), promote private investment for job creation. Furthermore, in accordance with the document containing the Framework, and given that 80 per cent of the population are vulnerable or poor, and that the labour force will continue to expand over the next 20 years, the Framework also envisages investing in activities focused on improving the functioning of the economy as a whole, ensuring more rapid growth, and helping to create more and better jobs. The Committee observes, however, that the Government’s report does not provide information on the results achieved by the PNDH 2012–16, or on the measures adopted to improve the living standards of the population.

The Committee expresses deep concern regarding the serious situation in the country, which stems from the political and social crisis following the protests that began on 18 April 2018, and which has had a serious impact on the living conditions of the population. In this regard, the Committee notes the information included in the report of the United Nations Office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights (OHCHR) entitled Human rights violations and abuses in the context of protests in Nicaragua, 18 April–18 August 2018, which expresses concern about human rights violations and abuses in the context of the protests in Nicaragua. The Committee notes that, according to the above report, the independent Nicaraguan Foundation for Economic and Social Development (FUNIDES) estimated that, since the beginning of the crisis, 215,000 individuals had lost their jobs and 131,000 had fallen below the poverty line as of 28 June 2018. The report states that the crisis was also characterized by an unprecedented wave of illegal occupations of private land by pro-Government groups. According to the estimations of the Union of Nicaraguan Agricultural Producers (UPANIC), by 31 July 2018, around 4,000 hectares of land had been illegally occupied in the seven departments of the Pacific and the centre of the country. The Higher Council of Private Enterprises (COSEP) has reported other violations of rights, including attacks against enterprises and unjustified delays in the clearance of imported goods. Furthermore, the enjoyment of the right to health has been significantly affected by the crisis, with an estimated 2,000 people injured during the protests. On 25 May 2018, the Nicaraguan Medical Association publicly denounced the manipulation of the public health system through the refusal of medical care for the individuals injured during the protests, including the closure and cordoning-off of hospitals by the authorities, police and/or pro-Government armed elements. Moreover, physicians and other health professionals, including nurses and administrative staff, have been dismissed for treating injured individuals during the protests or for their alleged involvement in the protests, in the same manner as teachers who supported the protests. The Committee also notes that, according to the report, on 14 August 2018, the National Assembly adopted a law that cut public spending by almost US$185 million (approximately 7 per cent of the annual budget). The report indicates that these measures will affect government projects in sectors such as health, housing, justice and education, and could jeopardize the enjoyment of the right to work, health, education and food by the majority of the population, which has already been experiencing the adverse effects of the crisis in recent months. The Committee observes that, according to the information published in October 2018 by the World Bank, which is available on its website, after achieving a record growth rate of 5.1 per cent in 2011, the economy slowed from 4.7 per cent in 2016 to 4.5 per cent in 2017, with a further contraction of 3.8 per cent forecast for 2018. The Committee therefore requests the Government to provide detailed information, including statistics disaggregated by sex and age, on the results achieved by the National Human Development Plan (PNDH 2012–16), the Country Partnership Framework for Nicaragua for 2018–22, and on any measures aimed at ensuring the improvement of the standards of living of the Nicaraguan population (Article 2), particularly with regard to groups in vulnerable situations, such as women, young people, people with disabilities, small-scale producers engaged in subsistence agriculture, and indigenous communities and communities of African descent. While noting the harm caused to the living conditions of the population as a result of the political and social crisis in the country, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary steps to ensure that these measures take into account essential family needs of workers such as food and its nutritive value, housing, clothing, medical care and education (Article 5(2)). It also requests the Government to supply information on any measures taken in this regard and their outcome. In this context, the Committee reminds the Government of the possibility of availing itself of ILO technical assistance.

Part III. Migrant workers. In reply to the Committee’s previous comments, the Government states that, under the agreement concluded with Costa Rica, 28,452 Nicaraguan workers migrated to Costa Rica in a regulated and orderly manner during the different agricultural cycles between 2006 and 2018. The Government indicates that the majority of migrant workers are men working in the agricultural sector in the production of sugar cane, melons and pineapples. The Committee notes that, in its concluding observations of 11 October 2016, the UN Committee on the Protection of the Rights of All Migrant Workers and Members of their Families (CMW) observed the considerable number of frontier workers and seasonal workers migrating, in particular to Costa Rica, and increasingly, to Honduras, El Salvador and Panama. The CMW also observed with concern that this migration from the State party was largely driven by poverty, inequality and social exclusion, which could put Nicaraguan migrant workers and members of their family into precarious or insecure situations (CMW/C/NIC/CO/1, paragraphs 51 and 65). The Committee requests the Government to provide updated and detailed information on the measures adopted to ensure that the working conditions of migrant workers who are required to live away from their homes take into account their family needs. The Committee also requests the Government to supply statistical data, disaggregated by sex and age, on the number of migrant workers required to live away from their homes.

Article 13. Voluntary savings. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to provide information on the manner in which savings and credit cooperatives had contributed to encouraging voluntary forms of savings among wage earners and independent producers. The Government indicates that the Minister of the Family Economy, Communities, Cooperatives and Associations (MEFCCA) has registered 277 savings and credit cooperatives, in which 107,615 workers and producers are participating. However, the Committee notes that, in its concluding observations of 11 October 2016, the CMW observed with concern the lack of measures to support access to financial institutions and to promote financial literacy, particularly among women (CMW/C/NIC/CO/1, paragraph 49). The Committee requests the Government to provide current information on the measures adopted to encourage wage earners and independent producers to practice the voluntary forms of thrift covered by the Convention. It also requests the Government to indicate the measures adopted to protect wage earners and independent producers against usury, and particularly to specify the measures taken with a view to reducing the rates of interest on loans by the control of the operations of moneylenders, and the encouragement of facilities for borrowing money for appropriate purposes through cooperative credit organizations or through institutions which are under the control of the competent authority. The Committee also requests the Government to provide information on the measures adopted in this regard that are aimed specifically at women.

Social Policy (Basic Aims and Standards) Convention, 1962 (No. 117)
(ratification: 1983)

The Committee notes the observations made by the National Union of Workers of Venezuela (UNETE), the Confederation of Workers of Venezuela (CTV), the General Confederation of Workers (CGT) and the Confederation of Autonomous Trade Unions (CODESA), received on 26 September 2018. The Committee also notes the observations of the Independent Trade Union Alliance Confederation of Workers (CTASI), received on 29 August 2018. The Committee requests the Government to provide its comments in this respect.

Parts I and II of the Convention. Improvement of standards of living. The Committee notes the information provided by the Government in response to its previous comments regarding the series of social programmes adopted with a view to bolstering the Missions and Major Missions to improve the quality of life of the population. Among other measures, the Government refers to the transformation in June 2018 of the Youth Employment Plan into the Major Youth Employment Mission, which targets young people between the ages of 15 and 35 years, especially unemployed graduates, persons without education, single mothers, persons with family responsibilities and vulnerable persons. This Major Mission aims, inter alia, to integrate young people into productive work in areas associated with meeting human needs, and to train and qualify young people in occupations that produce goods and services for which there is a high social demand. The Government reports that 1,100,000 young people were enrolled in the Major Mission in August 2018. In June 2017, the “We are Venezuela” movement was established, comprising mainly young people who visit homes with a view to assisting vulnerable families in order to strengthen social policies. In 2016, Local Supply and Production Committees (CLAP) were established and there are now more than 32,000 committees throughout the country responsible for distributing essential goods (food and sanitation products) to more than 6 million families. The Government also reports the introduction of the Carnet de la Patria identity card, an innovative social protection system, through which the beneficiaries of the various social programmes are registered with a view to streamlining the implementation of those programmes, and in which 16,595,140 people are registered. The Government also refers to the Major Mission for Households in the Motherland, which aims to end extreme poverty in the country, the rate of which, according to the Government, is currently 4.4 per cent. This Mission covers more than 1,300,000 vulnerable families and aims to reach 2 million households. The Government also indicates that, since its establishment in 2011, the Major Mission for Housing in Venezuela has built 1,926,448 homes and aims to build a further 3 million by 2019.

The Committee expresses deep concern regarding the serious situation in the country, denounced by the CTASI in its observations, particularly the lack of access to essential goods, which has led to an increase in migration to other countries in the region and a number of protests, as well as increased violence and crime associated with a lack of food (looting, robbery, black market sales, smuggling, threats to those responsible for food distribution, etc.). The CTASI indicates that income poverty increased in the country from 81.8 per cent in 2016 to 87 per cent in 2017. Furthermore, it asserts that the Venezuelan food system assessment, initiated in 2017, has been characterized by a sustained reduction in national production, imports and food consumption, thus increasing the alarming levels of acute malnutrition in the population. The CTASI alleges that women and girls are the worst affected and cases of sex being exchanged for boxes of food from the CLAP have been reported. The CTASI also states that several regulations have been adopted with a view to controlling food production and distribution in the country, most notably the approval in January 2018 of the Act establishing Local Supply and Production Committees. In this regard, it reports irregularities in food distribution by CLAPs, such as their insufficient frequency and geographical coverage, their failure to take into account the criterion of household vulnerability, discrimination in access to food on the grounds of political affiliation and cases of poisoning as a consequence of rotten food. The Committee notes with concern the assertion by UNETE, CTV, CODESA and CGT that the Carnet de la Patria identity card is a social control mechanism. They assert that, with promises of bank deposits, food vouchers, toys and other benefits, the Government uses the Carnet de la Patria identity card and the “We are Venezuela” movement to mobilize voters during elections. They also allege that the Government uses food scarcity to maintain total control over voters and sometimes delivers boxes of food through the CLAPs for electoral purposes. Regarding the programmes implemented, they indicate that the Major Youth Employment Mission does not guarantee young people access to stable and decent work, but rather to short-term “gigs” and that, according to a report by the Office of the Comptroller General of the Republic, school food programmes are hampered by planning, supervision and internal control issues. The Committee refers to its comments on the application of the Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122), the Paid Educational Leave Convention, 1974 (No. 140), and the Human Resources Development Convention, 1975 (No. 142), which are related to the present Convention, and requests the Government to provide detailed and updated information in its next report on the Convention in relation to the impact of the measures implemented on improving standards of living for the whole population. The Committee also requests the Government to indicate how it guarantees that these measures take into account such essential family needs as food and its nutritive value, housing, clothing, medical care, including access to medicines, and education.

Part IV: Remuneration of workers. Advances on wages. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to provide rulings by courts of justice or updated copies of administrative decisions addressing the maximum amount and manner of the repayment of advances on wages that give effect to Article 12(2) and (3) of the Convention.
The Committee notes that the Government refers in its report to article 91 of the Constitution of the Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela and section 103 of the Basic Act concerning labour and men and women workers (LOTTT), which establishes that wages cannot be seized. The Government reiterates that, under the provisions of section 154 of the LOTTT “throughout the employment relationship, the debts that men and women workers agree with their employer shall only be repayable, on a weekly or monthly basis, in amounts that may not exceed one third of the equivalent of a week or month of work, as appropriate”. The Government indicates that the decisions of the competent administrative authorities are based on the provisions of the aforementioned section. The Government adds that debts are repaid, but not advances on social benefits granted to cover the basic needs of housing, education and health, which can reach up to 75 per cent. The Committee observes, however, that the Government does not provide specific examples of rulings by courts of justice or administrative decisions addressing the maximum amount and manner of repayment of advances on wages. The Committee once again requests the Government to provide specific and recent examples of rulings by courts of justice or administrative decisions addressing the maximum amount and manner of repayment of advances on wages, in accordance with the requirements of Article 12 of the Convention.

Direct requests

In addition, requests regarding certain matters are being addressed directly to the following States: Convention No. 82 (France: French Polynesia, New Zealand: Tokelau, United Kingdom: Anguilla, United Kingdom: Bermuda, United Kingdom: British Virgin Islands, United Kingdom: Falkland Islands (Malvinas), United Kingdom: Montserrat); Convention No. 117 (Central African Republic, Democratic Republic of the Congo, Georgia, Ghana, Guinea, Jordan, Madagascar, Malta, Republic of Moldova, Ukraine).
Migrant workers

Barbados

Migration for Employment Convention (Revised), 1949 (No. 97) (ratification: 1967)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government’s report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments initially made in 2013.

Articles 7 and 9 of the Convention. Free services and assistance and transfer of remittances. In its previous comments, the Committee considered that the requirement for migrant workers participating in the Canada–Caribbean Seasonal Agricultural Workers Programme “the Farm Labour Programme” – to remit 25 per cent of their earnings to the Government directly from Canada as mandatory savings, 5 per cent of which was retained to pay the administrative costs of the Programme, could be contrary to the spirit of Article 9 of the Convention. The Committee had also taken note of the concerns expressed by the Congress of Trade Unions and Staff Associations of Barbados that this requirement, together with the immediate deduction of certain costs such as airfares, pension and medical contributions from the workers’ pay, created hardship for the workers, and the Programme needed to be reviewed. The Committee also drew the Government’s attention to the fact that charging workers for purely administrative costs of recruitment, introduction and placement is prohibited under the Convention (General Survey of 1999 on migrant workers, paragraph 170).

The Committee notes the Government’s indication that arrangements are made for a percentage of the earnings of the workers on overseas programmes to be remitted back to the country for them to access upon return and that workers travelling on the overseas programmes are required to sign an “agreement” (contract of employment) which allows for the deduction of 20 per cent of their wages to cover administration costs and national insurance contributions. According to the Government, upon arrival in Canada the workers are met by the Barbados liaison officers and in Barbados the employment services to migrants are rendered free of charge by the National Employment Bureau, which oversees the promotion and departure of workers. The Committee notes that the “Agreement for the Employment in Canada of Commonwealth Caribbean Seasonal Agricultural Workers – 2013” provides that the worker agrees that the employer shall remit to the government agent 25 per cent of the worker’s wages for each payroll period and that “a specified percentage of the 25 per cent remittance to the government agent shall be retained by the Government to defray administrative costs associated with the delivery of the programme” (section IV, paragraphs 1 and 3). The worker also agrees to pay to the employer part of the transportation costs and the employer, on behalf of the worker, will advance the work permit fees and be reimbursed by the government agent (section VII, paragraphs 3–4). The Committee requests the Government to clarify why it is considered necessary to require migrant workers under the Farm Labour Programme to remit 25 per cent of their wages to the liaison service for mandatory savings, including for administrative costs, and to indicate whether the liaison service has a role in the recruitment, introduction and placement of migrant workers and whether any of the administrative costs retained by the liaison service relate to recruitment, introduction or placement. The Committee also requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that migrants for employment are permitted to transfer their earnings or such part of their earnings and savings as they desire, and to provide information on any steps taken, in cooperation with the workers’ and employers’ organizations, to review the impact of the Farm Labour Programme on the situation of Barbadian migrant workers.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Kenya

Migrant Workers (Supplementary Provisions) Convention, 1975 (No. 143) (ratification: 1979)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government’s report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments initially made in 2012.

Articles 10, 12 and 14(a) of the Convention. National policy on equality of opportunity and treatment, and free choice of employment. For a number of years, the Committee has addressed the issue of the existing policy of “Kenyanization” of employment which was considered by the Committee as contrary to the principle established by the Convention of equality of opportunity and treatment between national and foreign workers provided that foreign workers are residing lawfully in the country of employment. The Committee notes with interest that section 5 of the Employment Act 2007 provides that the Minister, labour officers and the Industrial Court shall promote and guarantee equality of opportunity for a person who is a migrant worker or a member of his or her family lawfully within Kenya. Section 5 also prohibits direct and indirect discrimination on the grounds of race, colour, sex, language, religion, political or other opinion, nationality, ethnic or social origin, disability, pregnancy, mental status or HIV status, with respect to recruitment, training, promotion, terms and conditions of employment, termination of employment or other matters arising out of employment. Besides, it establishes that an employer shall pay his or her employees equal remuneration for work of equal value. The Committee further notes the adoption of the National Gender and Equality Commission Act, 2011 and the Citizens and Foreign Nationals Management Service Act, 2011. The Committee requests the Government to indicate the manner in which section 5 of the Employment Act 2007 is applied in practice, namely how it is translated into a national policy designed to promote and to guarantee equality of opportunity and treatment in respect of employment and occupation, social security, trade union and cultural rights and individual and collective freedoms for persons who, as migrant workers or as members of their families are lawfully within its territory, as provided in Articles 10 and 12(a)–(g) of the Convention. Please provide information on the functioning of and the measures adopted on these issues by the National Gender and Equality Commission and the Citizens and Foreign Nationals Management Service.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.
Malaysia

Sabah

Migration for Employment Convention (Revised), 1949 (No. 97)
(ratification: 1964)

Article 6 of the Convention. Equal treatment. Minimum wages and the foreign worker levy. The Committee recalls its previous comments in which it noted that the National Wages Consultative Council Act 2011 (Act 732) and the Minimum Wages Order 2012 provided for a regional monthly minimum wage for Sabah covering national and foreign workers, but exclude domestic workers from their application. It also recalls that an annual foreign worker levy in the plantation sector, agricultural and fishing sector, manufacturing sector, construction sector, and in the services sector, and for domestic workers, is to be paid to the Immigration Department. The Government also indicated that, as of 1 January 2014, all employers employing foreign workers should pay the minimum wage and would be allowed to deduct the foreign worker levy and the cost of accommodation from migrant workers’ wages, but not from the minimum wage. As the Government had indicated in the past that the levy was paid by the employer and could not be deducted from the wages of the foreign worker, the Committee considered that ambiguity existed regarding the foreign worker levy and permissible deductions from minimum wages of foreign workers, since the establishment of the regional minimum wage for Sabah.

The Committee notes that the Government’s report has not been received. It notes however that the Government provided information in 2016 confirming the Malaysian government policy requiring the levy to be borne by the foreign worker. The Government however indicates that pursuant to section 113(4) of the Sabah Labour Ordinance (Cap 67), no deductions of levy and accommodation costs are allowed, except at the request in writing of the employee and with prior permission by the competent authority. The Government adds that when approving such requests, the wish of the foreign worker to pay the levy in instalments or by way of a lump sum, is being taken into account; not allowing the deduction of the levy from wages of foreign employees, despite their written request, would only burden these employees. While noting these explanations, the Committee remains concerned that, in practice, employers may still deduct the amount of the levy from the minimum wage of the foreign worker, which would result in less favourable treatment of these workers with nationals, contrary to Article 6(1)(a) of the Convention. Noting further that the Government had previously reported that the levy was meant to help defray the costs of maintenance of the facilities and infrastructure used by foreign workers during their stay in the country, the Committee considers that, especially when levy rates are high, imposing the burden of the levy on the foreign worker would not be equitable and could have a negative impact on the wages and general working conditions and rights of migrant workers. Regarding deductions for costs of accommodation, the Committee notes the Government’s explanations that such deductions will not be allowed if it is agreed that the employer has the obligation to provide free accommodation to the employees. The Committee asks the Government to clarify the reasons for laying the burden of maintenance costs of facilities and infrastructure, through payment of an annual levy, with the foreign worker, and to indicate whether any consideration is being given to shift the burden of the foreign worker levy onto the employer, or to examine alternative ways to compensate for the so-called costs for facilities and infrastructure generated by foreign workers during their stay. The Committee also asks the Government to specify the applicable legal provisions or policy prohibiting levy deductions from the minimum wage, and to indicate the measures taken to ensure that, in practice, employers do not deduct the levy amount from the minimum wages paid to foreign workers. Recalling that the Government had previously indicated that it was willing to examine the impact of the levy system on the working conditions and equal treatment of migrant workers, including wages, the Committee requests the Government to update such an assessment on its results and any further information on its results and any further information given to it.

Article 6(1)(b) of the Convention. Equality of treatment with respect to social security. Employment injury benefits. The Committee notes that the Government’s report was not received despite the Committee’s longstanding comments regarding differences in treatment between nationals and temporary foreign workers with respect to payment of social security benefits in the case of industrial injuries. The differences relate to the Workmen’s Compensation Scheme (WCS), which guarantees to foreign workers employed in the country for up to five years only a lump-sum payment of a significantly lower amount than the periodical payments to victims of industrial injuries provided under the Employees’ Social Security Scheme (ESS), while Malaysian nationals and foreign workers permanently residing in Malaysia (Sabah) continue to be covered by the ESS. The Government had previously indicated that it was looking into various options, with the participation of all stakeholders with a view to bringing the national legislation in line with the requirements of the Convention. The Committee recalls that it has been raising this same issue since 1993 in the context of its comments under the Equality of Treatment (Accident Compensation) Convention, 1925 (No. 19), with respect to Peninsular Malaysia and Sarawak. The Committee refers the Government to its observation on Convention No. 19 which notes the discussion on the application of that Convention in Peninsular Malaysia and Sarawak by the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards (CAS) in June 2017. The Committee notes that the CAS once again called upon the Government to take immediate, pragmatic and effective steps to ensure that the Convention’s requirement of equal treatment of migrant workers and national workers was met and to expedite its efforts to this effect, as the need for progress was becoming increasingly urgent. The Committee urges the Government to take into account its comments on the application in Peninsular Malaysia and Sarawak of Convention No. 19 when addressing the issue of equal treatment between migrant workers and nationals with respect to industrial injuries in Sabah.

Other social security benefits. With respect to other social security benefits, including medical care, old-age, invalidity and survivor’s pensions, as well as sickness and maternity benefits, the Committee notes that the Government has not provided any further information in this respect. Taking into account the large number of foreign workers concerned, the Committee urges the Government to provide information on the steps taken, including the conclusion of bilateral or multilateral agreements, to ensure that migrant workers do not receive treatment which is less favourable than that applied to nationals or foreign workers permanently residing in the country with respect to all social security benefits.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.
Spain

Migration for Employment Convention (Revised), 1949 (No. 97) (ratification: 1967)

The Committee notes the observations of the General Union of Workers (UGT) received on 17 August 2017, and which were forwarded by the Government, and the Government’s reply.

Article 6(1)(a) and (b) of the Convention. Equal treatment regarding conditions of work and social security. The Committee notes the observations of the UGT concerning the exclusion of domestic workers from the Occupational Risk Prevention Act (No. 31 of 8 November 1995) and particularly concerning the fact that section 26 of the Act relating to maternity protection is not applied to these workers. The Committee notes the Government’s reply in its report indicating, inter alia, that the above-mentioned Act does not apply to domestic work because the household is not considered an enterprise or workplace, and so it is impossible to monitor compliance with obligations in this area. However, the Act provides that the householder is obliged to ensure that the work of his/her employees is done under appropriate conditions of safety and health (section 3(4)). The Government also refers to section 7(2) of Royal Decree No. 1620/2011 of 14 November 2011 establishing special labour regulations for domestic work, under which the employer is obliged to ensure that the work of the domestic employee is done under appropriate conditions of safety and health, for which purpose the employer shall adopt effective measures, taking due account of the specific features of domestic work. Serious failure to comply with these obligations shall constitute grounds for resignation by the employee. Recalling that migrant domestic workers are at particular risk of abuse and exploitation, the Committee requests the Government to indicate the measures taken: (i) to ensure that such workers receive information, in an appropriate manner and in a language that they understand, on the conditions of work applicable under national law; and (ii) to ensure that existing complaint mechanisms are effective and accessible. Further, recalling that over half the foreigners employed in Spain are engaged in domestic work, the Committee requests information on complaints filed by domestic workers, investigations conducted, and sanctions issued.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Direct requests

In addition, requests regarding certain matters are being addressed directly to the following States: Convention No. 97 (Barbados, Belize, Dominica, Ecuador, Grenada, Guatemala, Guyana, Jamaica, Kyrgyzstan, Malawi, Malaysia: Sabah, Spain, Tajikistan, Trinidad and Tobago, United Kingdom: Anguilla, United Kingdom: British Virgin Islands, United Kingdom: Jersey, United Kingdom: Montserrat, Uruguay); Convention No. 143 (Guinea, Kenya, San Marino, Uganda).

Dominica

Merchant Shipping (Minimum Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 147) (ratification: 2004)

The Committee notes with deep concern that the Government’s report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments initially made in 2012.

Article 2 of the Convention. Implementing legislation. The Committee notes the Government’s indication that a special Tripartite Committee has been appointed to advise the Government on all matters relating to legislation and institutional changes necessary for the ratification of the Maritime Labour Convention, 2006 (MLC, 2006). It also notes that a National Action Plan has been prepared in order to formulate recommendations to the Government on matters of maritime laws and administration. While welcoming the Government’s active steps towards the ratification of the MLC, 2006, the Committee is bound to observe that the Government’s first report on the application of Convention No. 147 does not contain any information on the laws or regulations and other measures giving effect to the specific requirements of the latter Convention. The Committee therefore requests the Government to indicate in detail how each of the Articles of the Convention is applied in national law and practice, and explain in particular in what manner the provisions of the International Maritime Act, 2002, and of the Dominica Maritime Regulations, 2002, are substantially equivalent to the Conventions mentioned in the Appendix of the Convention relating to safety standards, social security measures and shipboard conditions of employment and shipboard living arrangements, as required under Article 2 of the Convention.

The Committee expects that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Egypt

Accommodation of Crews Convention (Revised), 1949 (No. 92) (ratification: 1982)

Articles 6–17 of the Convention. Crew accommodation requirements. In its previous comments, the Committee observed that the national legislation did not give effect to any of the technical accommodation standards set out in Articles 6–17 of the Convention, such as those related to the minimum floor area of sleeping rooms, size of berths, lighting, ventilation, heating, mess rooms, sanitary facilities and hospital accommodation. In this respect, the Committee recalls that a legislative gap analysis, which was prepared in 2010 with the support of the Office with a view to assisting the Government with its preparations for the ratification of the MLC, 2006, as amended (MLC, 2006), similarly concluded that in a possible amendment to Maritime Law No. 8 of 1990, provision should be made for practically every aspect of crew accommodation contained in Title 3 of the MLC, 2006. The Committee further notes that a workshop on the MLC, 2006, was conducted by the Office in Alexandria in 2015. In its reply, the Government indicates that work is under way to bring national legislation into conformity with the provisions of Convention No. 92. The Government further indicates that the legislative committees continue their sessions so as to bring into conformity relevant national legislation with the provisions of the MLC, 2006, in preparation for its effective implementation before ratification. The Committee requests the Government to take all the necessary steps in order to bring its maritime legislation into conformity with the requirements of this Convention. The Committee also requests the Government to keep the Office informed of any developments in the process of ratification of the MLC, 2006.

Ghana

Seafarers’ Identity Documents Convention, 1958 (No. 108) (ratification: 1960)

Articles 1–6 of the Convention. Issuance of seafarers’ identity documents. The Committee had noted that pursuant to section 121 of the Ghana Shipping Act, 2003 (Act No. 645), the Minister may make regulations to provide for the conditions of service of persons serving on Ghanaian ships and Ghanaian nationals serving on foreign ships, and the implementation of any international Convention relating to the employment, welfare, security, certification or status of seafarers. The Committee notes with regret that the Government, in its report, does not provide information on any regulations adopted to implement the provisions of the Convention. The Committee further notes that the Government reiterates its previous indication, namely that the specimen of a seafarers’ identity document is not readily available. The Committee therefore requests the Government to indicate the measures taken to give effect to the Convention and to provide a specimen of the seafarers’ identity document.

Article 5. Readmission of seafarers holding Ghanaian seafarers’ identity documents. The Committee had requested the Government to provide information on the measures taken to ensure that non-Ghanaian seafarers holding a Ghanaian seafarers’ identity document are admitted into Ghanaian territory. The Committee notes that the Government reiterates its previous indication, namely that a seafarers’ identity document and proof of engagement by a shipping company are required before a seafarer is permitted entry into the territory. The Committee recalls that any seafarer who holds a valid seafarers’ identity document issued by the competent authority of a territory for which the Convention is in force shall be readmitted to that territory, whether or not they are presently engaged with a shipping company or agent.
The same applies during a period of at least one year after expiry of their identity document. The Committee therefore requests the Government once again to indicate the measures adopted to give effect to this provision of the Convention.

Repatriation of Seafarers Convention (Revised), 1987 (No. 166)
(ratification: 1990)

The Committee notes the observations of the Confederation of Industrial Chambers of the United States of Mexico (CONCAMIN), forwarded by the International Organisation of Employers (IOE) on 26 July 2016, regarding the Government’s application of Conventions Nos 22, 55, 134, 163 and 164. CONCAMIN indicates that, in view of the Committee’s considerations and the legislation in force, it would be appropriate to analyse the whole body of standards relating to seafarers and indicates its willingness to participate in the process of analysis and implementation of ad hoc regulations. The Committee requests the Government to send its observations in this regard. The Committee also notes the reports sent by the Government on the application of the abovementioned maritime Conventions and Convention No. 166. In order to provide an overview of matters arising in relation to the application of these Conventions, the Committee considers it appropriate to examine them in a single comment, as follows.

The Committee notes the Government’s indication that, under article 133 of the Political Constitution of the United States of Mexico (Constitution) and section 6 of the Federal Labour Act of 1 April 1979, treaties form part of national law and may be applied without it being necessary to adopt national legislation. The Committee observes that article 133 of the Constitution provides that the said Constitution, the laws of the National Congress emanating from it and all treaties which are in conformity with it, concluded by the Government with the approval of the Senate, shall be the supreme law of the land, and that the judges of each federal entity shall act in conformity with the Constitution, laws and treaties, notwithstanding any provisions to the contrary in the constitutions or laws of federal entities. The Committee also observes that, under section 6 of the Federal Labour Act, the respective laws and treaties concluded and approved in accordance with article 133 of the Constitution shall be applicable to employment relationships in respect of all the benefits enjoyed by workers, from the date of entry into force. On this basis, in the absence of specific national provisions that give effect to the self-executing provisions of the Conventions, the Committee has considered the latter provisions to be directly applicable in Mexico. However, the Committee wishes to emphasize that the maritime Conventions contain a number of provisions which are not self-executing and hence require the adoption of legislation and other measures by the Government.

Seamen’s Articles of Agreement Convention, 1926 (No. 22)

Article 3(1) of the Convention. Facilities to examine the articles of agreement before signature. In its previous comments, the Committee asked the Government to indicate the manner in which it is ensured that seafarers are given facilities to examine the articles of agreement before signature. The Committee notes the Government’s indication in this regard that seafarers may consult free of charge the Federal Conciliation and Arbitration Board and the Office of the Federal Prosecutor for the Defence of Labour regarding any queries concerning the content of the agreement. The Committee also notes the Government’s indication that, under section 28 of the Federal Labour Act, when a Mexican worker is employed abroad, the agreement shall be submitted to the Federal Conciliation and Arbitration Board to verify that it satisfies the conditions of work prescribed by the abovementioned Act. The Committee notes this information.

Article 6(3)(10). Information to be included in the agreement. Conditions for the termination of the agreement. In its previous comments, the Committee drew the Government’s attention to the fact that the Federal Labour Act does not include, among the indications which must be provided in writing in the agreement, the conditions for termination of the agreement. The Committee notes the Government’s indications that such conditions are established in sections 194 and 195 of the Federal Labour Act, which include the stipulation that the agreement shall indicate whether it is concluded for a definite or indefinite period or for an individual voyage, and in section 206 of the aforementioned Act concerning the termination of employment relationships of workers on board vessels. Furthermore, the Committee notes the Government’s indication that, under article 133 of the Constitution and section 6 of the Federal Labour Act, the provisions of Article 6(3) of the Convention concerning the particulars that the agreement must contain are directly applicable in national law. While recalling the self-executing nature of Article 6 of the Convention, the Committee notes the information provided by the Government and considers that it responds to its previous request on this matter.

Article 9. Termination of the agreement. In many previous comments, the Committee noted that section 209(III) of the Federal Labour Act – which provides that employment relationships may not be terminated when the vessel is abroad, in unpopulated areas or in port, should the vessel be exposed in the latter case to any risk due to bad weather or other circumstances – is not in conformity with Article 9 of the Convention, which provides that an agreement for an indefinite period may be terminated by either party in any port where the vessel loads or unloads, provided that the notice specified in the agreement shall have been given. The Committee notes the Government’s indications that the purpose of section 209(III) of the Federal Labour Act is to prevent workers and the vessel itself from being exposed to exceptional situations of risk and does not prevent the termination of the employment relationship when such a situation no longer exists. However, the Committee once again observes with deep concern that section 209(III) of the Federal Labour Act prevents the possibility of an agreement for an indefinite period being terminated in any port where the vessel loads or unloads, as required by the Convention. The Committee therefore once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures without delay to bring the national legislation into conformity with Article 9 of the Convention.

Article 14(1). Record of discharge in the identity document. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that the copy of the seafarers’ book and identity document sent by the Government does not include a space to enter the expiry or termination of the agreement. The Committee notes the Government’s indication that the Ministry of Communication and Transport (SCT), the competent authority for issuing this document, stated that in view of the austerity measures regarding the use of government resources and the significant number of seafarers’ books and identity documents in circulation, the space for noting the expiry or termination of the agreement has not yet been incorporated in the document in question. The Committee requests the Government to provide up-to-date information on the measures taken to ensure that any discharge is recorded in the document issued to the seafarer, in accordance with Article 14(1) of the Convention.

Shipowners’ Liability (Sick and Injured Seamen) Convention, 1936 (No. 55)

Article 6 of the Convention. Repatriation expenses in the event of sickness or injury. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that, under section 204(VII) of the Federal Labour Act, employers have the obligation to provide seafarers with food and accommodation, medical treatment and medicines in the event of illness, but that there is no mention of shipowners’ responsibility to bear the cost of repatriation for a sick or injured seafarer who is put ashore during the voyage as a result of illness or injury. The Committee notes the Government’s indication that the Federal Labour Act does not specifically establish the obligation to cover repatriation expenses in such circumstances. However, the Government indicates that this obligation derives from article 123(A)(XXVI) of the Constitution, which provides that employment contracts concluded between a Mexican citizen and a foreign employer shall clearly specify that the cost of repatriation shall be borne by the employer. The Committee observes that this provision of the Constitution does not regulate the repatriation of seafarers on vessels flying the Mexican flag or not under foreign ownership. The Committee once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that all seafarers have the right to be repatriated at the expense of the shipowner in the event of sickness or injury, in accordance with Article 6 of the Convention.

Prevention of Accidents (Seafarers) Convention, 1970 (No. 134)

Article 2(3). Detailed statistics on occupational accidents on board. In its previous comments, the Committee asked the Government to take the necessary steps to ensure the availability of statistics relating to occupational accidents on board that indicate clearly the part of the ship (deck, engine room or catering areas) and the location (at sea or in port) where the accident occurred, in accordance with Article 2(3). The Committee notes the Government’s indications that: the Merchant Shipping Department at the SCT and the Mexican Social Security Institute (IMSS) compile the relevant statistics; the IMSS bases its statistics on the data compiled in the occupational accident notification system (SIATT), and the relevant Mexican Official Standard (NOM-036-SCT4-2007 of 17 August 2007) is being updated. However, the Committee observes that the statistics of the Merchant Shipping Department forwarded by the Government do not indicate the part of the vessel or the location where accidents occurred. The Committee also notes that the Government has not provided any statistics from the IMSS and that the SIATT accident notification form does not include a space to indicate in the part of the ship and the location where the accident occurred. Lastly, while noting that NOM-036-SCT4-2007 provides that the shipowner shall report occupational accidents to the maritime authority, the Committee points out that the aforementioned standard does not specify the level of detail to be included in such reports. The Committee therefore requests the Government to indicate whether and how the different mechanisms established for the compilation of information on occupational accidents on board (by the Merchant Shipping Department or the SIATT system) enable the Government to have disaggregated statistics, in accordance with Article 2(3) of the Convention.

Article 3. Research into general trends and hazards of maritime employment. In its previous comments, the Committee asked the Government to take steps to conduct research into general trends and hazards of maritime employment. The Committee notes the information provided by the Government on occupational safety and health (OSH) advisory committees at both the national and the individual state level (COCONASST and COCOESST, respectively and on the National Advisory Committee on OSH Normalization). The Committee also notes the Government’s indications that the Federal Occupational Safety and Health Regulations (Federal OSH Regulations), which apply to ships, require employers to do research into the risks of various types of jobs and to send information to the Ministry of Labour and Social Welfare. The Government also indicates that employers can examine the risks of occupational accidents through OSH committees and services. However, the Committee observes that the mechanisms for research into the occupational hazards described by the Government are not exclusive to maritime employment. The Committee therefore requests the Government to clarify whether in practice such research makes it possible to establish general trends and hazards peculiar to maritime employment, and can be used in relation to the prevention of accidents in the particular context of maritime employment, in accordance with Article 3 of the Convention.

Article 4(3). Measures for the prevention of occupational accidents. In its previous comments, the Committee firmly requested the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the standards applicable to seafarers for the prevention of accidents and the protection of health in employment specify the particular features of maritime employment listed in Article 4(3), such as structural features of the ship, machinery, special safety measures on deck, loading and unloading equipment, fire prevention and firefighting, anchors, chains and lines, dangerous cargo and ballast, and personal protective equipment. The Committee notes that the information supplied by the Government is of a general nature and does not mention the adoption of any standards that meet the requirements of Article 4(3). The Committee therefore once again requests the Government to take the necessary steps to ensure that the standards applicable to seafarers for the prevention of occupational accidents include the aspects listed in Article 4(3) of the Convention.

Article 8. Programmes for the prevention of occupational accidents. In its previous comments, the Committee asked the Government to provide information on the formulation and implementation of programmes for the prevention of occupational accidents among seafarers. The Committee notes the Government’s indication that the SCT and the Ministry of Shipping have competence for the matters covered by the Convention. However, the Committee observes that the Government does not indicate whether these authorities have drawn up the prevention programmes required under Article 8. The Committee also notes the information provided by the Government to the effect that the Ministry of Labour and Social Welfare does not have separate programmes for the prevention of accidents to seafarers, to whom the general OSH self-management programme (PASST) – of general application – applies. The Committee once again notes with regret that the information provided by the Government refers to generally applicable OSH programmes, whereas the Convention requires specific maritime programmes to be drawn up in cooperation with shipowners’ and seafarers’ organizations. The Committee therefore once again requests the Government to take the necessary steps to formulate and implement programmes which give effect to Article 8 of the Convention.

Seafarers’ Welfare Convention, 1987 (No. 163)

Articles 2, 5 and 6 of the Convention. Welfare facilities and services in ports and on board ship. Review of welfare facilities and services. International cooperation. In its previous comments, the Committee asked the Government to provide information on the functioning of seafarer centres (Casas del Marino) in various ports in the country, on the review of welfare facilities and services for seafarers, and on international cooperation in this field. The Committee notes that the Government refers once again to the General Regulations for Seafarers of 8 December 1943 but does not indicate how the seafarer centres operate in practice. Furthermore, the Committee notes that the Government once again refers to section 214 of the Federal Labour Act, which provides that the Federal Executive Authority shall determine how services in seafarer centres shall be maintained and improved, without indicating whether any regulations have been promulgated under the aforementioned section. The Committee recalls that, under Article 2 of the Convention, each Member undertakes to ensure that adequate welfare facilities and services are provided for seafarers both in port and on board ship. Services shall be reviewed frequently to ensure that they are appropriate in the light of changes in the needs of seafarers resulting from technical, operational and other developments in the shipping industry (Article 5). Moreover, each Member undertakes to cooperate with other Members with a view to ensuring the application of the Convention (Article 6). The Committee once again requests the Government to indicate the measures taken to give effect to these provisions of the Convention.

Health Protection and Medical Care (Seafarers) Convention, 1987 (No. 164)

Article 4(c) of the Convention. Right to visit a medical doctor. In its previous comments, the Committee asked the Government to take the necessary measures to guarantee seafarers the right to visit a doctor without delay in ports of call where practicable. The Committee notes the Government’s indications that: (a) seafarers have the unrestricted right to medical consultations in ports of arrival; and (b) seafarers may use IMSS hospitals in Mexican ports and are covered for medical assistance abroad by the insurance policies concluded by shipowners with “protection and compensation associations”. While noting this information, the Committee observes that the Government does not indicate the legal provisions which ensure compliance with Article 4(c) of the Convention, according to which seafarers must be guaranteed the right to visit a doctor without delay in ports of call where practicable. The Committee firmly requests the Government to provide the aforementioned information.

Article 5(4) and (5). Inspection at regular intervals of the medicine chest. Checking of the labelling. In its previous comments, the Committee asked the Government to take steps to give effect to the specific requirements relating to the regular inspection of the medicine chest on board at intervals not exceeding 12 months and the checking of the labelling, expiry dates and conditions of storage of all medicines contained in the medicine chest, in accordance with Article 5 of the Convention. The Committee notes the Government’s indications that: (a) the Merchant Shipping Department is responsible for the application of Mexican Official Standard NOM-034-SCT4-2009 of 24 February 2009 concerning OSH conditions for the handling, transportation and storage of hazardous chemicals, which stipulates that a medicine chest must be carried on board; and (b) maritime safety inspections are ongoing and can be conducted at any time. However, the Committee observes that the information provided by the Government does not indicate how such inspections are ensured at regular intervals not exceeding 12 months or whether the requirements for storage of the medicines listed in Article 5(4) and (5) are checked. The Committee therefore once again requests the Government to provide information on the intervals at which on-board medicine chests are inspected, and on the checking of compliance with the provisions of the Convention regarding the labelling and storage of medicines.

Article 7. Medical advice by radio or satellite communication. In its previous comments, the Committee asked the Government to indicate the manner in which it is ensured that vessels can obtain medical advice at any time of day by radio or satellite communication, in accordance with Article 7. The Committee notes with regret that the Government once again refers in this regard to the Maritime Safety Inspection Regulations of 12 May 2004, which require vessels to carry radio communication equipment on board. The Committee recalls that the existence of radio communication equipment on board is not sufficient to ensure the availability of medical advice on vessels on the high seas at any time of day or night, in accordance with Article 7. The Committee therefore once again requests the Government to indicate the measures taken to give effect to this Article of the Convention.

Article 8. Presence of a medical doctor on board ships. In its previous comments, the Committee drew the Government’s attention to the fact that neither the Maritime Safety Inspection Regulations nor the Federal Labour Act specify the ships or categories of ships which are required to carry a medical doctor as a member of the crew. In this regard, the Committee notes that the Government once again refers to section 204(VIII) of the Federal Labour Act, under which employers are obliged to carry medical staff and equipment on board as established by the laws and regulations on maritime communications. In view of the fact that the provisions referred to by the Government do not meet the requirements of Article 8, the Committee once again requests the Government to indicate the measures taken to ensure that ships covered by the Convention carry a medical doctor as a member of the crew.

Article 9. Training courses for persons in charge of medical care. In its previous comments, the Committee reminded the Government that training courses for persons in charge of medical care on board vessels who are not doctors must meet the requirements of Article 9, such as being approved by the competent authority and being based on the content of the relevant international guides. The Committee notes the Government’s indications that the Nautical Academies and the Education Centre provide senior and junior Merchant Navy officers with training courses which conform to the requirements of the International Convention on Standards of Training, Certification and Watchkeeping for Seafarers (STCW), including courses in basic first aid, medical first aid and medical care. The Committee also notes the Government’s indication that these courses are approved at the national level by the Ministry of Public Education and the Maritime Authority, while the qualifications and validations issued are recognized at the global level by the International Maritime Organization. The Committee notes this information, which meets the requirements of the Convention.

Article 11. Hospital accommodation. In its previous comments, the Committee drew the Government’s attention to the fact that the national legislation does not give effect to Article 11, which stipulates that in any ship of 500 or more gross tonnage, carrying 15 or more seafarers and engaged in a voyage of more than three days’ duration, separate hospital accommodation must be provided. In this regard, the Committee notes with regret that the Government refers once again to section 49 of the Federal OSH Regulations of 13 November 2014, which regulate the provision of preventive occupational medical services. The Committee reiterates that the aforementioned Regulations are of a general nature and do not contain provisions determining the type of vessel in which separate hospital accommodation is required or describing the particular features of such hospital accommodation. The Committee therefore requests the Government once again to take the necessary steps to give effect to Article 11 of the Convention.

Repatriation of Seafarers Convention (Revised), 1987 (No. 166)

Article 2(1)(c) of the Convention. Repatriation in the event of illness, injury or other medical condition. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that, under section 204(VII) of the Federal Labour Act, employers have the obligation to provide seafarers with food and accommodation, medical treatment and medicines in the event of illness, but that there is no mention of shipowners’ responsibility to bear the cost of repatriation for a sick or injured seafarer who is put ashore during the voyage as a result of illness or injury. The Committee notes the Government’s indication that the Federal Labour Act does not specifically establish the obligation to cover repatriation expenses in such circumstances. However, the Government indicates that this obligation derives from article 123(XXVI) of the Constitution, which provides that employment contracts concluded between a Mexican citizen and a foreign employer shall clearly specify that the cost of repatriation shall be borne by the employer. The Committee observes that the provision of the Constitution does not regulate the repatriation of seafarers on vessels flying the Mexican flag or not under foreign ownership. The Committee once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that all seafarers have the right to be repatriated at the expense of the shipowner, in accordance with Article 2(1)(c) of the Convention.
Article 2(1)(e) and (f). Repatriation in the event of the inability of the shipowner to continue to fulfil legal or contractual obligations or in the event that a seafarer does not consent to go to a war zone. In its previous comments, the Committee asked the Government to take steps to ensure that seafarers have the right to be repatriated under the circumstances provided for in Article 2(1)(e) – namely, in the event of the shipowner not being able to continue to fulfil his or her legal or contractual obligations as an employer of the seafarer by reason of bankruptcy, sale of ship or any other similar reason – and in Article 2(1)(f) – namely, in the event of a ship being bound for a war zone to which the seafarer does not consent to go. The Committee notes the Government’s indication that section 204(IX) of the Federal Labour Act guarantees repatriation regardless of the reason. However, the Committee notes with regret that the aforementioned section excludes from its scope situations of separation for reasons that cannot be ascribed to the employer, which can include the cases listed in Article 2(1)(e) and (f). In view of the fact that section 204(IX) of the Federal Labour Act does not give adequate effect to Article 2(1)(e) and (f), the Committee once again requests the Government to take steps to ensure that the shipowner is obliged to bear the cost of repatriation, in accordance with Article 2(1)(e) and (f).

Article 2(1)(g). Repatriation in the event of termination or interruption of employment in accordance with an industrial award or collective agreement. In its previous comments, the Committee drew the Government’s attention to the absence of provisions in the national legislation on the right to repatriation in the event of the interruption or termination of employment in accordance with an industrial award or collective agreement. In this regard, the Committee notes that the Government refers to section 209(V) and (VI) of the Federal Labour Act. However, the Committee notes with regret that the aforementioned section only guarantees repatriation in the event of the loss of the ship through seizure or disaster, or in the event of a change of nationality. Hence it does not cover cases of termination or interruption of employment in accordance with an industrial award or collective agreement. In view of the fact that section 209(V) and (VI) of the Federal Labour Act does not give adequate effect to Article 2(1)(g), the Committee once again requests the Government to take steps to ensure that the shipowner is obliged to bear the cost of repatriation, in accordance with Article 2(1)(g).

Article 2(2). Maximum duration of service periods. In its previous comments, the Committee drew the Government’s attention to the absence of provisions on the maximum duration of service periods on board following which seafarers are entitled to repatriation. In this respect, the Committee notes with regret that the Government refers to sections 6 and 18 of the Federal Labour Act and article 133 of the Constitution. The Committee recalls that Article 2(2) requires national laws or regulations or collective agreements to prescribe the maximum duration of service periods on board following which seafarers are entitled to repatriation. The Committee therefore once again requests the Government to take the necessary steps to ensure that this duration is prescribed by national laws or regulations or collective agreements.

Article 3. Destinations for repatriation. In its previous comments, the Committee drew the Government’s attention to the absence of provisions establishing the right of seafarers to choose from among the prescribed destinations for repatriation. In this respect, the Committee notes that the Government refers to section 209(V) and (VI) of the Federal Labour Act. The Committee notes with regret that the aforementioned section only covers repatriation in the event of the loss of the ship through seizure or disaster, or in the event of a change of nationality for the ship, and does not allow seafarers in such situations to choose between different destinations. The Committee notes with regret the Government’s indication that sections 6 and 18 of the Federal Labour Act and article 133 of the Constitution give effect to Article 3. However, the Committee recalls that Article 3(1) requires national laws or regulations to prescribe the destinations to which seafarers may be repatriated. The Committee therefore once again requests the Government to adopt the necessary legislation to give effect to Article 3.

Articles 4 and 5. Responsibility of the shipowner to arrange for repatriation. In its previous comments, the Committee asked the Government to take steps to ensure the shipowner’s compliance with the obligation to arrange for repatriation through prompt and appropriate means. The Committee notes that the Government refers to section 209(V) and (VI) of the Federal Labour Act. However, the Committee observes that the aforementioned section guarantees repatriation only in the event of the loss of the ship through seizure or disaster, or in the event of a change of nationality for the ship. The Committee notes with regret that these provisions do not cover all the cases of repatriation envisaged in the Convention, do not specify which elements listed in Article 4 must be included in the cost of repatriation, and do not clarify how repatriation is to be arranged if the shipowner fails to make the necessary arrangements in accordance with Article 5. In view of the fact that section 209(V) and (VI) of the Federal Labour Act does not give adequate effect to Articles 4 and 5 of the Convention, the Committee once again requests the Government to take steps to ensure that repatriation is arranged for in accordance with the provisions of the Convention.

Article 6. Passport and other identity documents. In its previous comments, the Committee asked the Government to specify how it is ensured that seafarers who are to be repatriated are able to obtain their passport and other identity documents. The Committee notes that the Government indicates that the National Institute for Migration (INM) is responsible for making arrangements for entry into the countries of repatriation. While noting this information, the Committee recalls that Article 6 seeks to protect seafarers from situations in which they are obliged to surrender their passport to the shipowners, captain or employment agency, as a result of which they could be without an identity document at the time of repatriation. The Committee therefore once again requests the Government to clarify how it is ensured that seafarers can retain their passport or other identity documents for the purpose of repatriation.
Article 7. Paid leave. In its previous comments, the Committee drew the Government’s attention to the fact that the national legislation does not contain any provision ensuring that time spent awaiting repatriation and repatriation travel time is not deducted from paid leave accrued to the seafarer. The Committee notes that the Government refers to the direct application of the Convention and indicates that sections 6 and 18 of the Federal Labour Act and article 133 of the Constitution give effect to Article 7. The Committee notes this information, which responds to its previous requests.

Article 12. Availability of the text of the Convention in an appropriate language. In its previous comments, the Committee asked the Government to indicate the manner in which the text of the Convention in an appropriate language is made available to the crew members of every ship registered in its territory. The Committee notes the Government’s indication that consultations will be held with the Merchant Shipping Department on the possibility of disseminating the text of the Convention in English and Spanish to the crew members of every seagoing vessel registered in its territory. The Committee requests the Government to provide up-to-date information, further to consultations with the Merchant Shipping Department, on the application of this provision of the Convention.

In addition, requests regarding certain matters are being addressed directly to the following States: Convention No. 22 (Brazil, Iraq, Papua New Guinea, United Kingdom: Anguilla); Convention No. 23 (Azerbaijan, Iraq, United Kingdom: Anguilla); Convention No. 55 (Peru); Convention No. 56 (Peru); Convention No. 68 (Guinea-Bissau); Convention No. 69 (Guinea-Bissau); Convention No. 92 (Azerbaijan, Iraq, Republic of Moldova); Convention No. 108 (Guinea-Bissau, Romania, Saint Lucia, Saint Vincent and the Grenadines, Solomon Islands, United Kingdom: Anguilla); Convention No. 133 (Azerbaijan, Brazil); Convention No. 134 (Azerbaijan); Convention No. 146 (Brazil, Iraq); Convention No. 147 (Azerbaijan, Brazil, Iraq, Trinidad and Tobago); Convention No. 163 (Brazil); Convention No. 164 (Brazil); Convention No. 166 (Brazil); Convention No. 178 (Brazil); Convention No. 186 (Argentina, Australia, Bahamas, Bangladesh, Benin, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Cabo Verde, China, Ghana, Honduras, Hungary, India, Islamic Republic of Iran, Ireland, Kenya, Liberia, Malta, Mongolia, Montenegro, New Zealand, Nigeria, Philippines, Saint Kitts and Nevis, South Africa, Switzerland, Togo, United Kingdom: Bermuda).

Medical Examination (Fishermen) Convention, 1959 (No. 113)
(ratification: 1960)

Articles 2 to 5 of the Convention. Medical certificate. For 13 years, the Committee has been requesting the Government to provide information on the legislative texts giving effect to the specific requirements of Articles 3 to 5 of the Convention. In its previous comment, the Committee noted the Government’s indication that a review of the Merchant Navy Code had been launched in early 2015 with a view to adapting it to current realities, taking account of ratified international Conventions. The Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report that the Merchant Navy Code is still under review and promises to send a copy of it once the review has been completed. In this regard, the Committee recalls that the review of the Merchant Navy Code should take into consideration the issues of non-conformity with the Convention that have been raised for many years. These concern the obligation to produce a medical certificate prior to being engaged for employment on a fishing vessel (Article 2); the prescription of the nature of the medical examination to be made and the particulars to be included in the medical certificate (Article 3); the period of validity of medical certificates for young fishermen not exceeding one year (Article 4); and the possibility of applying for a further examination if the certificate has been refused (Article 5). In view of the foregoing, the Committee requests the Government to take any necessary measures to give full effect to the provisions of the Convention.

Medical Examination (Fishermen) Convention, 1959 (No. 113)

Accommodation of Crews (Fishermen) Convention, 1966 (No. 126)
(ratification: 1969)

The Committee notes the Government’s reports on the application of the Conventions related to fishing. In order to provide an overview of the issues relating to the application of these Conventions, the Committee considers it helpful to examine them in a single comment as follows.

Medical Examination (Fishermen) Convention, 1959 (No. 113)

Article 5 of the Convention. Additional medical examination by a medical referee. In its previous comments, noting the Government’s repeated indications that implementing legislation was in the process of being adopted, the Committee requested the Government to indicate the measures taken to ensure that a person who, after a medical examination, has been refused a certificate may apply for a further examination by an independent medical referee, as required by Article 5 of the Convention. The Committee notes the Government’s statement that a draft Order of the Ministry of Health on approval of the procedure for conducting examinations of occupational fitness and forms of medical assessment of fitness to perform specific types of work, is currently undergoing a public consultation process. Moreover, the Committee notes the Government’s indication that, with respect to fishing, which is regulated by the Merchant Shipping Code, the procedure for carrying out medical examinations and the form of medical assessment of the absence of medical contraindications to work on a vessel are established by the federal executive body responsible for the development of the state policy and legal regulation in the sphere of healthcare in agreement with the federal executive body responsible for transport. The Committee notes however that, according to the Government, this procedure has not been established. The Committee recalls that the issue of not having implementing legislation which regulates the procedure for filing an appeal where the fisher has been refused a medical certificate has been pending for many years. The Committee therefore requests the Government to adopt the necessary measures to implement Article 5 of the Convention without delay.

Accommodation of Crews (Fishermen) Convention, 1966 (No. 126)

Article 3(1) of the Convention. Laws and regulations on crew accommodation. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the lack of substantive progress in the adoption of legislation giving full effect to the provisions of the Convention and expressed the hope that the relevant legislation would be adopted in the near future. It also noted that, in previous reports, the Government had reiterated that it was in the process of preparing draft legislation which would replace the 1977 Regulations on sanitary rules for Soviet vessels and boats, in order to ensure conformity with the provisions of the Work in Fishing Convention, 2007 (No. 188). In this regard, the Committee notes the Government’s indication that the Rules of the Russian Maritime Register of Shipping regulate merchant shipping vessels but contain no special requirements for accommodation on fishing vessels. The Government further indicates that amendments to the Merchant Shipping Code and a number of legislative acts are currently under discussion in the State Duma in order to define the concept of fishing vessel and improve the safety of shipping and navigation. While noting this information, the Committee notes with regret that no substantive progress has been made regarding amending the legislation to bring it into conformity with the Convention. Recalling that the Committee has been drawing the Government’s attention for a number of years to the need to adopt laws and regulations giving effect to a series of provisions of the Convention, the Committee requests the Government once again to adopt the necessary measures without delay.

The Committee is raising other matters regarding Convention No. 126 in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Fishermen’s Competency Certificates Convention, 1966 (No. 125) (ratification: 1967)

The Committee notes with deep concern that the Government’s report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments initially made in 2005.

Articles 3-15 of the Convention. Certificates of competency. The Committee has been commenting for a number of years on the absence of laws and regulations giving effect to the Convention. The Committee asks the Government to provide detailed information on any concrete progress made in respect of the adoption of national laws implementing the Convention. The Committee understands that the Office remains ready to offer expert advice and to respond favourably to any specific request for technical assistance in this regard. Finally, the Committee requests the Government to supply up-to-date information concerning the fishing industry, including statistics on the composition and capacity of the country’s fishing fleet and the approximate number of fishers gainfully employed in the sector.

The Committee expects that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Direct requests

In addition, requests regarding certain matters are being addressed directly to the following States: Convention No. 112 (Guatemala); Convention No. 113 (Costa Rica, Cuba, Guatemala, Montenegro); Convention No. 114 (Costa Rica, Ecuador, Guatemala, Montenegro, Panama); Convention No. 125 (Brazil, France: French Polynesia, Panama); Convention No. 126 (Brazil, France: French Polynesia, Panama, Russian Federation, Sierra Leone).

The Committee noted the information supplied by the following States in answer to a direct request with regard to: Convention No. 113 (Brazil, Ecuador).
The Committee notes with concern that the Government’s report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments initially made in 2008.

The Committee notes with regret that the report submitted by the Government is identical to the most recent report submitted by the Government in 2007 which formed the basis for the Committee’s observation in 2008 repeated in 2009, 2010 and 2011 for lack of a response from the Government. The Committee urges the Government to solicit technical assistance of the ILO to resolve any problems related to the application of this Convention, and hopes that a report will be supplied for examination by the Committee at its next session. In the meantime and in the absence of any new information, the Committee must, yet again, repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

The Committee notes the information provided by the Government according to which a national advisory technical committee on occupational safety and health has been set up pursuant to Decree No. 2000-29 of 17 March 2000 which gives effect to Article 7 of the Convention. It also notes, however, that the information requested concerning Articles 2, 4, 5, 6 and 11–36 are to be provided by the Government subsequently. As regards the further information the Committee has requested the Government to provide, the Committee notes that the Government has either not replied to questions raised by the Committee in its previous comments or it has provided information that is applicable to enterprises in general. The Government appears to imply that dockworkers should be treated in the same manner as other workers and ports be treated like any other enterprise. With reference to Articles 4–7, the Committee wishes to recall that the Government is required to take measures to give effect to the specific provisions in the Convention. The Committee must therefore once again repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

The Committee draws the Government’s attention to the absence of specific health and safety provisions for dock work. The Committee noted previously that a draft Order on safety and health in dock work had been prepared by the technical departments of the Ministry of Labour and Social Security. In its report for the period ending 30 June 1993, the Government repeated this information and added that the draft had been submitted for adoption. The Committee hopes that the provisions of this text will ensure the application of the following provisions of the Convention: Article 4 (objectives and areas to be covered by measures to be established by national laws and regulations, in accordance with Part III of the Convention); Article 5 (responsibility of employers, owners, masters or other persons as appropriate, for compliance with safety and health measures; duty of employers to collaborate whenever two or more of them undertake activities simultaneously at one workplace); Article 7 (consultation of and collaboration between employers and workers). It asks the Government to provide a copy of the above Order as soon as it has been adopted.

In its previous reports, the Government referred to Orders No. 9033/MTERFPSS/DGT/DSSHT on the organization and functioning of the socio-medical centres of enterprises in the People’s Republic of the Congo and No. 9034/MTERFPSS/DGT/DSSHT laying down the procedures for the establishment of socio-medical centres which are common to several enterprises in the People’s Republic of the Congo. Since these texts have not been received, the Committee would be grateful if the Government would provide a copy of them.

Article 6. The Committee notes from the Government’s report for the period ending 30 June 1993 that briefings are to be organized to inform workers about safety provisions in the place of work at which heads of establishment can alert them about the dangers arising from the use of machinery and the precautions to be taken. The Committee asks the Government to provide a copy of the provisions concerning the organization of these briefings and the measures taken to give effect to paragraph 1(c) of this Article.

Article 8. The Committee notes the Government’s statement in its report for the period ending 30 June 1993 that all safety measures are provided for in Chapter II of Order No. 9036 of 10 December 1986. The Committee notes that the above part of the Order provides for general protective measures whereas the Convention requires the adoption of measures specific to dock work. It asks the Government to indicate which provisions require the adoption of effective measures (fencing, flagging or other suitable means including, when necessary, cessation of work) to ensure that when the workplace has become unsafe, workers are protected until it has been made safe again.

Article 14. The Committee notes from the Government’s report for the period ending 30 June 1993 that the application of this Article is ensured by labour inspectors by means of inspections in enterprises. The Committee asks the Government to indicate which provisions ensure that electrical equipment and installations are so constructed, installed, operated and maintained as to prevent danger, and which standards for electrical equipment and installations have been recognized by the competent authorities.

Article 17. The Committee notes that section 41 of Order No. 9036, cited by the Government in its report for the period ending 30 June 1993 as giving effect to this Article of the Convention, includes specific measures only for the use of lifting gear in particular weather conditions (wind). The Committee asks the Government to indicate the measures taken to ensure that the means of access to a ship’s hold or cargo deck are in conformity with the provisions of this Article.

Article 21. The Committee notes the provisions of sections 47–49 of Order No. 9036 which the Government cites in its report for the period ending 30 June 1993 as giving effect to this Article of the Convention. It notes that the above sections provide for protective measures for some machinery or parts of machines which can be dangerous. It asks the Government to indicate the measures taken or envisaged to ensure that all lifting appliances, every item of loose gear and every sling or lifting device forming an integral part of a load comply with the provisions of the Convention.

Articles 22, 23, 24 and 25. Further to its previous comments, the Committee notes that, in its report for the period ending 30 June 1993, the Government refers to the certification of machinery, including lifting appliances, which is conducted by technical inspectors and advisory bodies, as a general measure to ensure that lifting appliances are sound and in proper working order. However, these Articles of the Convention provide for a set of measures to ensure that appliances and loose gear can be used by workers without any danger or risk: testing of all lifting appliances and loose gear (every five years in ships); thorough examination (at least once every 12 months); regular inspection before use. The Committee asks the Government to indicate the provisions requiring the above measures to be taken in respect of all lifting appliances – on shore and on board – and of all loose gear.

Article 30. The Committee notes that section 43 of Order No. 9036 referred to by the Government, does not relate to the attaching of loads to lifting appliances. It asks the Government to indicate which provisions relate to this matter.

Article 34. The Committee asks the Government to provide a copy of the instructions concerning the wearing of personal protective equipment referred to by the Government in its report for the period ending 30 June 1993.

Further to its previous comments, the Committee notes that section 147 of the Labour Code regulates the evacuation of injured persons who are able to be moved and who are not able to be treated by the facilities made available by the employer. It notes that the Government also refers in its reports to Orders Nos 9033 and 9034 mentioned in paragraph 2 above.

The Committee asks the Government to indicate the measures taken either under the above texts, or otherwise, to ensure that adequate facilities, including trained personnel, are available for the provision of first aid.

Article 37(1). The Committee recalls that, under this provision of the Convention, committees which include employers’ and workers’ representatives must be formed at every port where there is a significant number of workers. Recalling the Government’s statement that the health and safety committees provided for by the law have not been formed, the Committee asks the Government to indicate the measures taken to ensure the establishment of such committees in ports with a significant number of workers.

Article 38(1). The Government indicates in its report that, in the absence of health and safety committees, instruction and training are entrusted to a specialist in the matter within the enterprise. The Committee asks the Government to provide information on the activities of these specialists.

Article 39. The Committee notes that section 61 of Act No. 004/86 of 25 February 1986 establishing the Social Security Code gives effect in part to this Article of the Convention. It asks the Government to indicate the provisions which ensure that this Article is applied to occupational diseases.

Article 41(1)(a). Further to its previous comments, the Committee notes that the Government refers to Order No. 9036 of 10 December 1986 as being the text which lays down general obligations for the persons and bodies concerned with dock work (ports being treated as any industrial enterprise) and that no specific measures have been taken in respect of dock work. The Committee asks the Government to indicate the measures taken or envisaged to set out the specific obligations taken for the persons and bodies concerned with dock work.

In the absence of any information on the application of the above provisions, the Committee asks the Government to indicate the specific measures which give effect to the following provisions of the Convention:

- Article 9(1) and (2). Safety measures with regard to lighting and marking of dangerous obstacles.
- Article 10(1) and (2). Maintenance of surfaces for traffic or stacking of goods and safe manner of stacking goods.
- Article 11(1) and (2). Width of passageways and separate passageways for pedestrians.
- Article 16(1) and (2). Safe transport to or from a ship or other place by water, safe embarking and disembarking, and safe transport to or from a workplace on land.
- Article 18(1)–(5). Regulations concerning hatch covers.
- Article 19(1) and (2). Protection around openings and decks, closing of hatchways when not in use.
- Article 20(1)–(4). Safety measures when power vehicles operate in the hold; hatch covers secured against displacement; ventilation regulations; safe means of escape from hoppers when dry bulk is being loaded or unloaded.
- Article 26(1)–(3). Members’ mutual recognition of arrangements for testing and examination.
- Article 27(1)–(3). Marking lifting appliances with safe working loads.
- Article 28. Rigging plans.
- Article 29. Strength and construction of pallets for supporting loads.
- Article 31(1) and (2). Operation and layout of freight container terminals and organization of work in such terminals.
- Article 38(2). Minimum age limit for workers operating lifting appliances.

The Committee expects that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

GUYANA

The Committee notes with concern that, since 2002, it has repeatedly requested the Government to communicate information to enable it to determine the manner in which the Convention is given effect in Guyana. It notes the Government’s brief report, which indicates that the working arrangements for dockworkers are not structured and organized. The Government adds that dockworkers are basically freelancers operating informally in the private sector and that, therefore, it is difficult to ascertain whether the provisions of the Convention are applied. In this respect, the Committee recalls that the Convention does not exclude independent workers. Article 1(1) of the Convention provides that it applies to all persons who are regularly available for work as dockworkers and who depend on dock work for their main annual income. The Committee therefore requests the Government to provide detailed information on the manner in which compliance with the provisions of the Convention is ensured. It further requests the Government to communicate the number of dockworkers in all occupational categories on the registers maintained in accordance with Article 3(1) of the Convention, and of any variations in their numbers (Part V of the report form).

The Committee expects that the Government’s next report will contain full information in response to its previous comments.
Republic of Moldova

Occupational Safety and Health (Dock Work) Convention, 1979 (No. 152) (ratification: 2007)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government’s report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments initially made in 2014.

Legislation. The Committee notes the information provided in the Government’s report on the effect given to the Convention. It takes due note of the Occupational Health and Safety Act (RM No. 186-XVI of 10 July 2008) (hereinafter, the OSH Act) as well as the Safety Rules for Work On-Board Inland Navigation Vessels, on the Operation of the Vessel’s Lifeboats and Lifesaving Equipment (hereinafter, the Safety Rules for Work On-Board Inland Navigation Vessels) referenced by the Government. However, it notes that the Government has not provided the specific legislation and regulatory provisions giving effect to the Convention. The Committee asks the Government to indicate, in its next report, the relevant provisions giving effect to each Article of the Convention and to communicate the text of these provisions, as well as a copy of the Safety Rules for Work On-Board Inland Navigation Vessels, if possible in one of the working languages of the Office.

The Committee also notes that the Giurgiulesti International Free Port (GIFP), capable of receiving both inland and seagoing vessels, boasts an easy access to the Black Sea and is increasingly important in the region. Consequently, the Committee asks the Government to transmit the GIFP Port Rules, and any standards or rules applicable to employers and workers, once they are adopted.

Article 1 of the Convention. Dock work. The Committee recalls that this Article of the Convention provides that the organizations of employers and workers concerned shall be consulted on, or otherwise participate in, the establishment and revision of the definition of dock work. The Committee asks the Government to provide information on the employers’ and workers’ organizations concerned and the manner in which they were consulted in establishing the definition of “dock work”.

Article 5(1). Responsibility for compliance with the measures referred to in Article 4(1). The Committee notes that according to the Government, section 10(1) of the OSH Act provides that the employer shall take the necessary measures to protect the health and safety of workers, including preventing occupational risks, providing information and training and ensuring the necessary organization and provision of resources. The Committee asks the Government to provide further information on the national laws or regulations which make appropriate persons responsible for compliance with all of the measures referred to in Article 4 of the Convention.

Article 6(1). Measures to ensure the safety of portworkers. The Committee notes the Government’s indication that periodic briefings are held with the employees of companies on safety techniques and training in safe working methods and approaches, and instructions have been developed in safety techniques. The Committee asks the Government to provide further information on the measures taken or envisaged to give effect to this Article of the Convention.

Article 7(2). Provisions for close collaboration between employers and workers. The Committee notes the Government’s indication that a trade union committee has been set up to ensure closer cooperation between workers and employers and to resolve any disputes that may arise. The Committee asks the Government to provide further details on the trade union committee and its work to ensure the application of the measures referred to in Article 4(1) of the Convention.

Article 14. Installation, construction, operation and maintenance of electrical equipment. The Committee notes the Government’s indication that the State Power Supply Inspectorate (Gosenergonadzor) approved rules on user operation of electrical installations and safety regulations on the operation of electrical installations. The Committee asks the Government to provide further details on the specific rules and safety regulations, regarding the operation of electrical installations, that give effect to this Article of the Convention.

Article 15. Adequate and safe means of access to the ship during loading or unloading. The Committee notes that the information provided by the Government repeats the terms of this Article, without providing specific information on the manner in which safe means of access to the ship shall be provided and kept available, in accordance with this Article. The Committee requests the Government to describe the safe means of access required when a ship is being loaded or unloaded alongside a quay or another ship.

Article 16. Safe transport to or from a ship or other place by water, safe embarking and disembarking, and safe transport to or from a workplace on land. The Committee notes the Government’s reference to paragraph 2 of rule 2.4 of the Safety Rules for Work On-Board Inland Navigation Vessels, which provides that operational boats shall be provided on all vessels more than 25 metres in length, except for high-speed and other passenger vessels operating within cities and crewless non-self-propelled vessels. However, the Committee notes that this provision does not ensure the full application of this Article of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to provide further details on the measures prescribed for the safe embarking and disembarking, and safe transport of workers, in accordance with Article 16.

Article 17. Access to the hold or deck of a vessel. The Committee notes that the information provided by the Government repeats the terms of this Article, without providing specific information on the application of this Article. The Committee asks the Government to provide details on the means of access to a ship’s hold or cargo deck, in accordance with paragraph 1(b) of this Article.

Article 34(1). Provision and use of personal protective equipment. The Committee notes that the information provided in the Government’s report repeats the terms of this Article, without providing specific information on the effect given to this Article. The Committee asks the Government to describe the circumstances in which the issue and use of personal protective equipment and protective clothing is required.

Article 36(1). Medical examinations. The Committee notes the Government’s indication that consultations are held with employers at annual general meetings and that the Ungheni River Port, in consultation with the industry trade union representing the interests of workers, is about to conclude a three-year collective agreement. The Committee asks the Government to indicate the means in which employers’ and workers’ organizations of all the ports in the Republic of Moldova were consulted regarding medical examinations.

Article 38(1). Provision of adequate training and instruction. The Committee notes the Government’s indication that instructions given to workers shall be formulated for all occupations and tasks performed at the company, on the basis of their specific characteristics and the specific nature of the tasks and workstations. The Committee asks the Government to indicate how instruction and training is provided to workers employed in dock work.

In addition, in the absence of any information on their application, the Committee requests the Government to provide details on the measures taken or envisaged, in law and in practice, to give full effect to the following provisions of the Convention:

- Article 6(2).
- Article 7(1).
- Article 8.
- Article 9.
- Article 10.
- Article 11.
- Article 12.
- Article 13(1)–(3) and (5)–(6).
- Article 19.
- Article 20.
- Article 21.
- Article 22(3) and (4).
- Article 24.
- Article 25.
- Article 26.
- Article 31.
- Article 32.
- Article 34(2) and (3).
- Article 37.
- Article 36(2) and (3).
- Article 38(2).
- Article 39.
- Article 40.
- Article 41.

Application of the Convention in practice. The Committee notes that the Government’s report does not contain any information regarding the application in practice of the provisions giving effect to the Convention. The Committee accordingly requests the Government to give a general appreciation of the manner in which the Convention is applied in the country and provide information on the number of dock workers employed, the number and nature of contraventions reported, the resulting action taken and the number of occupational accidents and diseases reported, and attach relevant extracts from the reports of the concerned inspection services.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Portugal

Follow-up to the recommendations of the tripartite committee (representation made under article 24 of the ILO Constitution)

The Committee recalls that the Governing Body approved at its 324th Session (June 2015) the report of the Committee set up to examine the representation alleging non-observance by Portugal of the Dock Work Convention, 1973 (No. 137), submitted under article 24 of the ILO Constitution by the Union of stevedores, cargo handlers and maritime checking clerks in central and southern Portugal, the Union XXI – Trade union association of administrative staff, technicians and operators at the container cargo terminals in the Port of Sines, the Union of dockworkers in the Port of Aveiro, and the Union of stevedores, cargo handlers and checking clerks at the Port of Caniçal (GB.324/INS/7/8, 13 June 2015). The Governing Body entrusted the Committee with following up on the issues raised in the report. In that respect, the Committee requested the Government to provide information on the application of Act No. 3/2013 of 14 January 2013 on dock work and the other measures that have been adopted in a tripartite context with a view to continuing to improve working conditions and efficiency in ports (paragraph 57 of the report). The Committee also requested the Government to provide information on the measures adopted by the competent authorities and the employers’ organizations that signed the agreement of 12 September 2012 for the application of the new legal framework governing the dock sector and to supply updated comparative statistical data on the number of dockworkers in the country, including the number of temporary or casual dockworkers (paragraph 83). It also asked the Government to indicate the measures adopted to bring the collective agreements in force in the various ports in the country into compliance with the new legal framework governing dock work set out in Act No. 3/2013 (paragraph 84).
The Committee notes the brief information communicated by the Government in response to its previous comments. The Government indicates that, following the approval by the Assembly of the Republic of the new legal framework governing dock work set out in Act No. 3/2013, of 14 January 2013, all the jobs of dockworkers holding permanent contracts with stevedore or dock work enterprises were retained, even those of workers performing work no longer classified as “dock work” under the new legal framework. The Government reports that in 2016 there were 1,653 dockworkers (including those with permanent, temporary and casual contracts) in mainland Portugal. However, the Committee observes that the Government does not indicate what percentage of the total of such workers were temporary or casual. On the other hand, the Government indicates that these workers enjoy good working conditions and, with a view to improving the working conditions of dockworkers, vocational training, further training and development courses have been provided to dockworkers and inspections have been carried out to verify the occupational safety and health conditions. The Government reports that 28 labour inspections were carried out in the area of dock work in 2014, while in 2015 only two inspections were conducted, in which no violations were detected. Lastly, the Committee notes that while the Government refers to the collective agreements in force that were concluded in the port sector between 2013 and 2016, it does not indicate the steps taken to bring those agreements into compliance with the new legal framework governing dock work. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on the application of Act No. 3/2013 on dock work and any other measures adopted in a tripartite context to continue to improve the working conditions and efficiency of ports. The Committee also requests the Government to provide information on the measures adopted by the competent authorities and the employers’ organizations that signed the agreement of 12 September 2012 for the application of the new legal framework for the port sector and to include updated comparative statistical data on the number of dockworkers in the country, disaggregated by age, sex and type of contract (permanent, temporary and casual contracts). The Committee also reiterates its request to the Government to indicate the measures adopted to bring the collective agreements in force in the various ports in the country into compliance with the new legal framework governing dock work set out in Act No. 3/2013.

Spain

The Committee notes the observations of the Trade Union Confederation of Workers’ Commissions (CCOO) and the General Union of Workers (UGT), included in the Government’s report.

Articles 2, 3 and 5 of the Convention. National policy to encourage the provision of permanent or regular employment for dockworkers. Registered dockworkers. Cooperation between the social partners. The Committee notes the information provided by the Government on the regime applicable to dockworkers in accordance with, among other legal instruments, the consolidated text of the State Ports and Merchant Marine Act, adopted by Royal Legislative Decree No. 2/2011 of 5 September (TRLPEMM) and the Decision of the General Directorate of Employment of 17 January 2014, which provides for the registration and publication of the Fourth Agreement for the regulation of labour relations in the dock work sector. The Government indicates that, in accordance with section 151(1) of the TRLPEMM and section 6.3.1 of the Fourth Agreement, dockworkers are bound by indefinite contracts to limited liability dockworker management enterprises (SAGEPs) established in ports of general interest. The Committee observes that SAGEPs keep a register of dockworkers who have a priority of engagement by port enterprises, as established in section 142 et seq. of the TRLPEMM. The Committee observes, however, that significant changes were introduced to the above regime with the adoption of Royal Legislative Decree No. 8/2017 of 12 May, which amends the regime governing workers engaged in the provision of cargo handling services in ports, in accordance with the ruling by the Court of Justice of the European Union (CJEU) of December 2014 in Case C-576/13. The CJEU ruling held that the Kingdom of Spain was not in compliance with the freedom of establishment, as it made it mandatory for enterprises from other member States wishing to conduct cargo handling activities in Spanish ports of general interest to register and have a share in the capital of a SAGEP, and to hire, as a priority, workers provided by the SAGEP, a minimum number of whom must be hired on a permanent basis. In this regard, the Committee observes that, in accordance with the explanation of the reasons for the above-mentioned Royal Legislative Decree, the new regime establishes the principle of the freedom to recruit in cargo handling services in ports. In this regard, in accordance with the Royal Legislative Decree, operators are not required to have a share in any enterprise providing dockworkers and may hire such dockworkers freely, on the condition that they meet a series of requirements for the training of these workers. The Royal Legislative Decree also provides for the establishment of port employment centres (PECs) which will manage the regular employment of dockworkers in cargo handling services in ports, and their training and temporary assignment to enterprises with a licence to provide cargo handling services in ports or the authorization to engage in commercial port services. The PECs will operate as temporary work agencies (TWAs) specific to the sector, with the legal requirement that such enterprises obtain authorization from the labour administration. Cargo handling enterprises will not be required to participate in the centres established, or to hire as a priority the workers that they provide. The Committee also notes that, in their observations, the workers’ organizations report that the new dock work regime is not in conformity with the requirements of the Convention. With regard to the establishment of measures to ensure the permanent or regular employment of dockworkers, the UGT maintains that the new regime removes the requirement for SAGEPs to hire workers permanently. It questions whether the new recruitment carried out by these enterprises or by PECs will make use of indefinite contracts, as they will be regulated by the TWAs.
Furthermore, during the period of transformation of the SAGEPs, which is planned to last three years, there will be a progressive relaxing of the requirement for cargo handling enterprises to hire workers from SAGEPs, before the requirement is removed after four years, when cargo handling enterprises will be able to freely recruit skilled dockworkers, whether through SAGEPs, PECs or TWAs, which will affect the current regular provision of services by dockworkers. The UGT indicates that this amendment has met with great opposition from trade unions representing dockworkers, not only in the media, but also through strikes, with the aim of preserving the current employment conditions. The UGT indicates that, in this context, an agreement was concluded with employers in the sector, which amended the Fourth Framework Agreement for the Dock Work Sector, with a view to including a clause referring to the subrogation of SAGEP workers in cargo handling enterprises based on their participation in SAGEPs. Ultimately, the UGT complains that, as a result of the adoption of the new regime, the employment security of dockworkers and their basic income will be affected, particularly in the case of new workers, due to the conditions of recruitment under the regime governing TWAs. With regard to the maintenance of a register of dockworkers, the UGT and the CCOO assert that, despite the claims put forward by workers’ organizations, the new regulations do not establish any requirement in this regard. The Committee requests the Government to provide detailed and updated information on the manner in which the new regime ensures permanent or regular employment for dockworkers (Article 2(1)). It also requests the Government to indicate the minimum periods of employment and minimum income assured for casual dockworkers as a result of the implementation of the new regime and collective bargaining (Article 2(2)). The Committee also requests the Government to provide information on the procedures of the new dock work regime which govern the establishment and maintenance of registers for all categories of dockworkers, and on the manner in which priority of engagement is ensured for registered dockworkers for dock work, and on the manner in which dockworkers are required to be available for work (Article 3). Lastly, the Committee requests the Government to provide detailed information on the issues raised by the social partners, and on the results of the dialogue process, including any changes in the manner in which dock work is organized in the country (Article 5).

Article 6. Safety, health, welfare and vocational training. The Committee notes the Government’s indication that, under the previous regime, section 153 of the TRLPEMM established the qualifications required to be included in registers of dockworkers. In this regard, the Government refers, among other regulatory instruments, to Order FOM/2297/2012 of 23 October 2012, which determines the vocational training qualifications required for the provision of cargo handling services in ports, and the Decision of the State Ports of 11 April 2011, which publishes the Governing Council Decision on the minimum content of the psychological and physical aptitude tests to determine the suitability of workers wishing to engage in cargo handling activities. The Government adds that section 152 of the TRLPEMM required SAGEPs to allocate a minimum of 1 per cent of their total payroll to the continuous training of their workers to ensure their professionalism. However, the Committee notes that section 3 of the Royal Legislative Decree amends the previous regulations on the training requirements for dockworkers. Pursuant to section 3, dockworkers are required to obtain the vocational skills certificate provided for in Annex VIII (cargo handling in docks, loading, unloading and trans-shipping services) of Royal Decree No. 988/2013 of 13 December 2013, which establishes nine certificates for vocational skills in maritime work and fishing. However, section 3(2) of the Royal Legislative Decree provides that such certification will not be mandatory for certain workers, such as those who have worked over 100 days in the dock work services of any European Union Member State prior to the entry into force of the Royal Legislative Decree. In this regard, the Committee notes the UGT’s indication that the application of the new training requirements raises an issue for dockworkers with temporary contracts who entered the service with the qualifications required by the previous regulations, but have not accumulated 100 days of work. The UGT indicates that such workers may be excluded as dockworkers, despite having the qualifications required under the previous regime, until they obtain the necessary vocational certification. With regard to safety, health and welfare measures, the Government indicates that Act No. 31/1995 of 8 November 1995 on the prevention of occupational hazards and its implementing provisions are applicable. The UGT adds that the new regulations on training may lead to safety problems, as they provide for the possibility of approving the certification required under the Royal Legislative Decree with the days worked in any Member State of the European Union, but do not provide that these days should be restricted to dock work, or refer to the conditions or training. The Committee requests the Government to provide detailed information on the issues raised by the social partners with regard to the application of the new provisions on the training of dockworkers.

Application of the Convention in practice. The Government indicates that, on 31 March 2017, 6,165 dockworkers had been registered, of whom 1,487 were registered in the Port of Algeciras, 1,455 in Valencia and 1,030 in Barcelona. The Committee requests the Government to provide a general assessment of the manner in which the Convention is applied in the country, including, for example, extracts from reports and data on the number of dockworkers and on the variations in their numbers over time.

Indigenous and tribal peoples

Indigenous and Tribal Peoples Convention, 1989 (No. 169)

Throughout its 100 years of existence, the matter of indigenous peoples has always been on the ILO agenda. On the occasion of the 30th anniversary of the adoption of the Indigenous and Tribal Peoples Convention, 1989 (No. 169), the Committee wishes to highlight some important advances made in the application of this instrument which the Committee has been able to note in its examination of the measures taken by the States that have ratified it. This anniversary also allows the Committee to underline some of the difficulties which continue to hamper the full realization of the rights of indigenous and tribal peoples enshrined in the Convention.

The Convention is the only international treaty that comprehensively and specifically covers the rights of indigenous and tribal peoples. The Committee recalls that the Convention revises the Indigenous and Tribal Populations Convention, 1957 (No. 107), which aimed at the integration of indigenous and tribal populations into the national communities of States. Considering that this approach was regarded as outdated, Convention No. 169 embodies the principles of respect for the cultural integrity of indigenous peoples, recognizing their value, and of their participation in decisions that affect them. To date, a total of 23 countries have ratified Convention No. 169. At its 328th Session (October – November 2016), the Governing Body requested the Office to commence follow-up with the member States currently bound by Convention No. 107, encouraging them to ratify Convention No. 169 as the most up-to-date instrument in this subject area.

With regard to the identification of indigenous and tribal peoples, the Committee has underscored the importance of guaranteeing that all peoples who meet the criteria provided for in the Convention, independent of their legal recognition in national legislation, enjoy the rights recognized in this instrument. The Convention enumerates a set of objective criteria to identify indigenous and tribal peoples. It provides that self-identification as indigenous or tribal shall be regarded as a fundamental criterion for determining the groups to which the provisions of this Convention apply. Thus self-identification constitutes the subjective criterion which complements the objective criteria. The Committee has noted that many countries sent detailed statistical information in relation to the number and geographical location of indigenous and tribal peoples. In addition, it should be noted that when conducting population census, some countries applied the criteria of self-identification. In this respect, the Committee reiterates that having reliable statistical data on the indigenous population, their location and socio-economic conditions constitutes an essential tool for effectively guiding and defining policies relating to indigenous peoples, as well as for monitoring the impact of the action carried out. All this is also crucial to enable governments to take appropriate measures to recognize, protect and value the cultural and social identity, customs and traditions of indigenous peoples.

The Committee notes that the fundamental concept of the Convention is the right of indigenous peoples to participate effectively in decisions that may affect them, as well as in the formulation, implementation and evaluation of plans and programmes for national and regional development which may affect them directly. In order to ensure effective participation, the Committee considers it key to develop and strengthen institutions with the participation of indigenous peoples. Several countries have established bodies tasked with formulating and coordinating national policy on indigenous matters, whether these be ministries or vice-ministries responsible for foreign affairs, advisory councils, coordinating bodies or independent institutions. In some countries, a cross-cutting approach has been adopted through the establishment of specifically dedicated areas in most ministries and public institutions. Furthermore, other countries have created permanent dialogue and participation forums. Irrespective of the type of structure established, the Committee has noted on various occasions that the body responsible for indigenous affairs must have adequate staff and financial resources, a well-defined legal framework and decision-making power. Additionally, indigenous peoples must be represented and participate in those institutions.

The Committee notes that the measures taken to strengthen indigenous and tribal peoples’ representative institutions contribute to fulfilling the State’s obligation to develop a systematic and coordinated action to implement the Convention. The aim of the systematic and coordinated action is to guarantee consistency among the different governmental institutions responsible for implementing the programmes and policies relating to indigenous peoples and is essential for the elimination of the inequalities that continue to affect some of these indigenous peoples. Often, the Committee has requested governments to provide information on the measures to give effect to that coordination and the manner in which the participation of indigenous peoples is guaranteed in the planning, implementation and evaluation of those measures.

The Committee underscores that the Convention enshrines the right of indigenous peoples to be consulted as a tool for ensuring the full participation of indigenous peoples in decisions that affect them. To that end, the Convention provides for the obligation of the State to consult with the indigenous peoples whenever consideration is being given to legislative or administrative measures which may affect them directly; and particularly before undertaking or permitting any programmes for the exploration or exploitation of existing resources pertaining to their lands. The Committee notes that in several countries, considerable efforts have been made to establish appropriate mechanisms for consultation with indigenous peoples, with the active participation with those peoples. Specific laws have been adopted which define the scope of the consultation and govern its procedure. In other countries, legislative drafts are being examined, aimed at regulating the consultation process with indigenous peoples. The Committee recalls the importance of carrying out prior consultation with the indigenous peoples before adopting such legislation or establishing such consultation mechanism. In this respect, the Committee notes that the Convention and the comments of the Committee have comprised a reference framework for these initiatives. The Committee also had the opportunity to clarify the concept of “consultation” in its general observations published in 2009 and 2011. The Committee noted that consultations must be formal, full and exercised in good faith; and there must be a genuine dialogue between governments and indigenous and tribal peoples characterized by communication and understanding, mutual respect, good faith and the sincere wish to reach a common accord. The Committee also recalls that it is incumbent upon governments to establish appropriate mechanisms for consultation at the national level and that public authorities must undertake consultations, without interference, in a manner appropriate to the circumstances, through indigenous and tribal peoples’ representative institutions, and with the objective of reaching agreement or consent to the proposed measures.

The Committee wishes to highlight that consultation should be seen as an essential instrument for the promotion of effective and meaningful social dialogue, mutual understanding as well as legal certainty. Consultation also constitutes an important step towards guaranteeing the free, effective and permanent participation of indigenous and tribal peoples in decision-making processes that affect them. The Committee recalls that, from a joint reading of the provisions of the Convention, it follows that consultation goes beyond one particular measure. Consultation aims also at promoting the application of all the provisions of the Convention in a systematic and coordinated manner, in cooperation with the indigenous peoples, which entails a gradual process of establishing adequate bodies and mechanisms for this purpose.

With respect to the matter of land, the Committee recalls that the Convention recognizes the spiritual and cultural value that indigenous peoples attribute to the land. On several occasions, the Committee has noted that the use of the term “lands” in the Convention covers the total environment of the areas which the peoples concerned occupy or otherwise use (for example, for hunting, fishing or religious and cultural rituals). With respect to the rights of ownership and possession of indigenous peoples over the lands which they traditionally occupy, the Committee notes that measures have been adopted with a view to securing legal recognition of this right in national legislation. In certain countries this right is enshrined in the Constitution. In this respect, indigenous land titling programmes and policies have been developed and implemented, and various governments have provided detailed information on the titled regions and the communities benefitting from these programmes. It is also necessary to note the adoption and implementation of land restitution plans for internally displaced persons with the participation of the indigenous peoples concerned. Despite the adoption of such measures, the determination of lands traditionally occupied by indigenous peoples, and ultimately the recognition of their rights to ownership and possession, continue to be critical issues in some countries, even generating conflict. The Committee recalls that the recognition of traditional occupation as the source of ownership and possession rights is the cornerstone on which the land rights system established by the Convention is based, and encourages governments to take the necessary measures to establish appropriate procedures in this regard. Furthermore, the Committee wishes to emphasize the need to adopt specific measures to prevent the removal of indigenous peoples from their land. In this regard, the Convention establishes that the removal and relocation of indigenous peoples from their lands constitutes an exceptional measure and shall only take place with their free and informed consent.

With regard to conditions of employment, the Committee has noted with concern the serious abuses against indigenous workers, especially in rural areas and the agricultural sector. In this respect, the Committee requested governments to adopt measures to eradicate forced labour and discrimination against men and women workers belonging to indigenous peoples, highlighting the need to ensure respect of their fundamental rights at work. To this end, it is fundamental to strengthen labour inspection in regions inhabited by indigenous peoples. The Committee also highlighted the importance of adopting measures to promote the participation of women in the labour market. With respect to vocational training, the Committee invited governments to develop vocational training programmes taking into account indigenous peoples’ economic, environmental, social and cultural conditions.

The Committee recalls that under the Convention the right of indigenous peoples is recognized to participate in the formulation and implementation of education programmes. The Committee has noted that, in order to promote the use of indigenous peoples’ traditional languages in schools, several governments have formulated and implemented bilingual education with the participation of members of those peoples. At the same time, indigenous teacher training programmes on the education curriculum have been carried out, taking cultural perspectives into account in their implementation. The Committee also noted special measures adopted to revive languages at risk of extinction.

The Committee welcomes the measures taken by governments to promote intercultural health services to which the members of indigenous communities contribute with their knowledge of traditional medicine. The Committee also encourages governments to intensify efforts to extend social security coverage to the members of indigenous peoples. In this regard, the Committee particularly emphasizes the importance of ensuring that account is taken of the characteristics, needs and specific views of indigenous and tribal peoples in the formulation and implementation of national social protection systems.

The Committee highlights the fact that, despite the progress made in the implementation of policies and programmes for recognizing and implementing the rights of indigenous peoples provided for in the Convention, the human rights situation of indigenous peoples in a number of countries remains a source of concern. The Committee has urged governments on several occasions to take measures to prevent acts of violence suffered by indigenous peoples and their representatives, including murder and intimidation, in the context of their action to defend their rights. The Committee is also concerned at the complaints submitted by the social partners relating to the criminalization of social protest. The Committee recalls the obligation of States which have ratified the Convention to ensure that indigenous peoples fully enjoy all their human rights. In this regard, the Committee underlines the importance of taking appropriate measures to ensure that all acts of violence against indigenous persons or peoples are investigated and that the personal integrity and safety of members of indigenous peoples are guaranteed. The Committee recalls the importance of ensuring that indigenous peoples are aware of their rights and have access to justice in order to assert their rights. The Convention specifically provides that measures shall be taken to ensure that indigenous or tribal peoples can understand and be understood in legal proceedings.

The Committee notes that, as part of the implementation of the Strategy for indigenous peoples’ rights for inclusive and sustainable development, adopted by the Governing Body in 2015, the Office will need to continue with awareness-raising and training activities relating to the Convention and devise and disseminate tools encompassing experiences and good practices to provide guidance for constituents when adopting policies and programmes relating to indigenous peoples. The Committee welcomes the adoption of this Strategy which demonstrates the importance of the Convention for the fulfilment of the ILO’s mandate, and hopes that in this context the Office can provide appropriate technical assistance to countries which request it. The Committee notes that the Strategy provides for reinforcing collaboration within the United Nations system with respect to promoting the rights of indigenous peoples. In this regard, the Committee notes that the Convention and the United Nations Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples, adopted in 2007, constitute two legal instruments of different nature and scopes which complement and reinforce each other. The Committee considers that the effective implementation of the Convention contributes towards achieving the objective of the Declaration as well as towards achieving the United Nations Sustainable Development Goals.

Central African Republic

Articles 2 and 3 of the Convention. Protection of human rights and fundamental freedoms of indigenous peoples.

In its previous comments, the Committee expressed deep concern at the continuing insecurity in the country and the acts of violence that have resulted in victims among the country’s indigenous communities and which have led to the flight of many farmers, particularly among the Mbororo, who have gone into exile in neighbouring countries. The Committee requested the national transitional authorities to make greater efforts to ensure full respect for the human rights of indigenous peoples, especially those of children and women from the Aka and Mbororo communities.

The Committee notes the Government’s indication in its report that in the wake of the crisis in the country in 2013 it observed mass displacements of indigenous peoples, particularly the Mbororo, against their will, for security-related reasons. The Government states that during the transition period the Aka and Mbororo peoples were identified and their representatives were appointed as national councillors to discuss, protect and defend their rights. The Government also refers to the guarantees enshrined in the new Constitution of 2016, particularly article 6, which provides that the State shall ensure the robust protection of the rights of minorities, indigenous peoples and persons with disabilities. The Government indicates that the National Recovery and Peacebuilding Plan for the Central African Republic, adopted in October 2016, constitutes an urgent and immediate response to the needs of all population groups without any distinction.

The Committee notes the different documents of United Nations (UN) bodies which examine the situation in the Central African Republic, in particular: the report of the Secretary-General on the situation in the Central African Republic; the report of the Independent Expert on the situation of human rights in the Central African Republic; and the report of the Panel of Experts on the Central African Republic (S/2018/922 of 15 October 2018; A/HRC/39/70 of 13 August 2018 and the statement of 27 September 2018; and S/2018/729 of 23 July 2018). The Committee notes that the Independent Expert indicates in her statement of September 2018 that the human rights situation is characterized by the constant attacks by armed groups on civilians, the continuing weakness of state authority, a culture of impunity, discrimination based on ethnic origin and religion, and the social fragmentation and marginalization of certain population groups. In general, the Committee observes that the information in the abovementioned documents reveals that although some progress has been observed, particularly in the context of the African Initiative for Peace and local peace agreements, the humanitarian and human rights situation remains a source of concern with a proliferation of conflict zones, constant abuses and human rights violations resulting from the persistent attacks by various armed groups, inter-community violence, and the displacement of large numbers of people. Moreover, the Committee notes that the UN Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights (CESCR), in its concluding observations of 4 May 2018, expressed its concern at the persistent marginalization, poverty and extreme vulnerability of indigenous populations (Mbororo and Aka), who continue to meet with considerable obstacles to the enjoyment of their rights under the Covenant, a situation which has worsened as a result of the situation of conflict in the Central African Republic (E/C.12/CAF/CO/1, paragraph 21).

The Committee notes all the above information with deep concern. While recognizing the complexity of the situation in the country, the Committee urges the Government to take all the necessary steps to put an end to the violence and human rights violations to which the civilian population has been exposed, especially those suffered by indigenous peoples who have been compelled to leave their territories. The Committee trusts that the implementation of the National Recovery and Peacebuilding Plan for the Central African Republic will enable the restoration of order, security and stability in the country so as to guarantee that the Aka and Mbororo peoples enjoy their rights under the Convention, to protect their integrity and to enable the return of persons displaced from their communities. The Committee requests the Government to indicate the measures taken in this regard and the manner in which indigenous peoples and their representatives have participated in the formulation and implementation of the measures that concern them.

Chile

Indigenous and Tribal Peoples Convention, 1989 (No. 169) (ratification: 2008)

The Committee notes the observations of the Single Central Organization of Workers of Chile (CUT-Chile), received on 13 September 2018. The Committee requests the Government to send its comments in this regard.

Article 6 of the Convention. Prior consultation. Indigenous constituent consultation process. The Committee notes the information provided by the Government in its report on the prior consultation processes conducted with indigenous peoples from 2009 to 2017, with regard to legislative measures and development projects, and that 85 out of 127 consultation processes have been finalized. The Government also includes a list of 45 official decisions from state administrative bodies establishing that the processes of consultation with indigenous peoples are not applicable.

The Committee notes the “Final report on systematization of the indigenous constituent consultation process” published in 2017 by the Ministry of Social Development. The report describes the process of consultation with indigenous peoples throughout the country with a view to enshrining the constitutional recognition of such peoples and their rights, under the supervision of an advisory and monitoring committee comprising organizations in the United Nations system and indigenous national councillors of the National Corporation for Indigenous Development (CONADI). The consultations took place between August 2016 and January 2017 with the Mapuche, Rapa Nui, Aymara, Quechua, Atacameño (Likan Antai), Diaguita, Colla, Kawashkar and Yagán peoples through convened meetings, self-convened meetings and individual participation, with the universities responsible for implementation. A total of 17,016 persons were consulted. The Committee notes the “Record of the outcomes of the national dialogue on the process of consultation concerning the constitutional recognition of the rights of indigenous peoples” signed on 21 October 2017 by representatives of the indigenous peoples, the Ministry of Development on behalf of the Government, and the UN Resident Coordinator in Chile in the capacity of guarantor and facilitator. The above-mentioned record contains the measures on which full agreement exists, including: (i) recognition of the pre-existence of indigenous peoples inhabiting the territory; (ii) recognition of the right of indigenous peoples to preserve, strengthen and develop their history, identity, culture, languages, institutions and traditions; (iii) the duty of the State to preserve the cultural diversity of the country; (iv) recognition and protection of the cultural and linguistic rights of indigenous peoples, their cultural, tangible and intangible heritage; and (v) reaffirmation of the principle of equality and non-discrimination on the basis of indigenous origin. The Committee notes that the “Bill amending the Fundamental Charter for enshrining the recognition of indigenous peoples, their culture and traditions, and ensuring their political participation and representation” (Official Gazette No. 11939-07) – which is based on the agreements achieved through the indigenous constituent process – was submitted to the Chamber of Deputies of Chile on 19 July 2018.

The Committee notes with interest the consultation process held with indigenous peoples in the country and the submission to the Chamber of Deputies of the “Bill amending the Fundamental Charter for enshrining the recognition of indigenous peoples, their culture and traditions, and ensuring their political participation and representation”. The Committee welcomes the efforts of the Government in this regard, which contribute towards strengthening the trust of the indigenous peoples. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on progress made regarding the process of constitutional recognition of indigenous peoples and their rights, further to the agreements enshrined in the “Record of the outcomes of the national dialogue on the process of consultation concerning the constitutional recognition of the rights of indigenous peoples” signed on 21 October 2017. The Committee also requests the Government to supply information on the manner in which the concerns expressed by indigenous peoples have been addressed in cases where it was decided that prior consultation processes were not applicable.

Articles 6 and 7(3). Consultations in the context of the Environmental Impact Assessment System. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the General Environment Act (No. 19.300 of 1994), which established the Environmental Impact Assessment System (SEIA), and also Decree No. 40 of 2013 issuing the SEIA Regulations. The Committee recalls that Act No. 19.300 establishes a procedure of informed participation for communities in the appraisal process for environmental impact studies; and that Decree No. 40 provided that projects going through the SEIA that directly affect indigenous groups must be subjected to a process of good-faith consultation. The Committee notes section 85 of Decree No. 40, which provides that the consultation process must be formulated and implemented by the Environmental Evaluation Service, taking account of appropriate mechanisms reflecting the particular socio-cultural characteristics of each people and their representative institutions so that communities have the possibility of influencing the environmental evaluation process.
The Committee recalls that, further to the recommendation of the tripartite committee appointed to examine the representation made by the First Inter-Enterprise Trade Union of Mapucho Bakers of Santiago, adopted by the Governing Body (GB.326/INS/15/5), it asked the Government to provide information showing that, in projects going through the SEIA which are likely to affect indigenous peoples directly, there had been compliance with Articles 6 and 7 and, where applicable, with Articles 15 and 16 of the Convention. In reply to this request, the Government includes detailed information in its report on projects going through the SEIA which have been the subject of consultations with indigenous communities on the basis of stages agreed upon between them and the Environmental Evaluation Service. The first project (Embalse Chironta), located in the Arica and Parinacota region, was given a favourable assessment in September 2014 after consultations with the Aymaras de Challapo, Chapisca and Molinos Inti Marka indigenous communities and also with the Molinos and Chapisca Indigenous Associations. The Government indicates that these communities were likely to be affected directly by the project owing to the transit of vehicles on an unpaved road, which would generate high levels of noise and emissions. As a result of the consultations, 13 agreements were reached on the use of mitigation measures, including an agreement with the Municipal Labour Information Office in the municipality of Arica regarding training in skills that might be needed during the work concerned. The second project (“New 2 x 220 kV line Encuentro–Lagunas”), located in the Antofagasta and Tarapacá regions, was given a favourable assessment in March 2016 after being the subject of consultations with the Aymara de Quillagua indigenous community. The Government indicates that this community was likely to be affected directly since the project was to go ahead on archaeological sites where the community held cultural events. As a result of the consultations, 13 agreements were reached relating to mitigation measures to protect the archaeological component, as well as as compensation measures, including the recovery of trails, the inclusion of local workers, and the construction and improvement of the community infrastructure and the Quillagua Tourist Information Centre.

The Committee requests the Government to continue providing information on the measures taken to give effect to the agreements reached with the communities consulted regarding the Embalse Chironta and “New 2 x 220 kV line Encuentro–Lagunas” projects, and to give effect to other agreements with indigenous communities which have been consulted through the Environmental Evaluation Service regarding development projects which affect them directly.

Articles 7(3), 15 and 16. Reform of the legislation on environmental impact assessment. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the setting up of an advisory board to evaluate and propose reforms to the SEIA and expressed the hope that the Government, on the occasion of the reform of the SEIA, would ensure the effectiveness of the mechanisms for the consultation and participation of indigenous peoples, as provided for by Articles 6, 7, 15 and 16 of the Convention. The Government indicates that the Chamber of Deputies has started its examination of a Bill to modernize the SEIA presented by the President of the Republic through Communiqué No. 062-366 of 27 July 2018. The objectives of the Bill include the incorporation of prior public participation in relation to projects going through the SEIA system with the aim of creating an early dialogue process between the community concerned and the project sponsor, on the understanding that the appropriate time for launching the dialogue is before the assessment of the project. Criteria for the early public participation stage include: the provision of accurate, timely and complete information; the creation of forums for interaction so that communities can influence aspects of the project; and good faith and respect for human rights. This stage would conclude with the establishment of terms of reference as a basis for the preparation and presentation of the respective environmental impact assessment. The Committee notes the Government’s indication in this respect that no consultations have been held with indigenous peoples on this matter, regardless of the fact that once these possible reforms take the shape of a legislative bill, they must be the subject of consultations since they entail legislative amendments relating to the consultation of indigenous peoples.

The Committee emphasizes that the Supreme Court issued a report on 5 September 2018 concerning the Bill modernizing the SEIA (No. 20-2018), in which it states that the early public participation process constitutes an opportunity for those directly concerned or affected by the project or activity to inform themselves in a full and timely manner, especially regarding the economic and social benefits and the possible environmental externalities. The Supreme Court indicates the need to clarify whether the early public participation process includes the prior consultation of indigenous peoples when the project or activity directly affects one or more indigenous groups. According to the Court, if this is the case, the SEIA should establish a good-faith consultation process. In this respect, the Court, invoking Article 7(3) of the Convention, emphasizes that the early participation of indigenous communities through prior consultation would enable them to discover and understand the cultural and social impact that investment initiatives can have on these communities. The Committee observes that the Court refers to the final report of the Presidential Advisory Board for the reform of the SEIA, which indicates that there is a need to analyse the indigenous consultation processes which occur in the context of the SEIA, since these are facing questions and criticisms regarding procedures, expected results and associated time frames. Taking account of the objective and scope of the proposed amendments, the Committee trusts that the Government will take the necessary steps to ensure that consultations are held with indigenous peoples during the process to reform Act No. 19.300 establishing the SEIA, and also regarding possible amendments to the SEIA Regulations, in so far as they directly affect their rights. The Committee requests the Government to ensure that any legislative proposal relating to environmental impact assessments: (i) complies with Articles 6 and 15 of the Convention with regard to consultations with indigenous peoples on projects for the exploration or exploitation of existing resources on lands traditionally occupied by the aforementioned peoples; (ii) ensures the cooperation of the peoples concerned in the assessment of the social, spiritual, cultural and environmental impact that the development activities can have on these peoples, in accordance with Article 7 of the Convention; and (iii) addresses situations envisaged in Article 16(2)–(5) of the Convention regarding projects that involve the removal of the peoples concerned from the lands they traditionally occupy. In this regard, the Committee recalls that the Convention establishes that the removal and relocation of indigenous peoples from their lands constitutes an exceptional measure, and shall only take place with their free and informed consent.

Indigenous and Tribal Populations Convention, 1957 (No. 107) (ratification: 1958)

Prospects of ratification for the most up-to-date Convention. In its previous comments, the Committee welcomed the legislative and institutional progress in areas relating to the protection of indigenous people’s rights; particularly the recognition of indigenous peoples in the Constitution, the Multi sectoral Round-table for Indigenous Peoples, and activities developed by the Indigenous Peoples Department under the Ministry of Culture. Noting that the Ministry of Labour and Social Welfare had prepared an analytical document which had come out in favour of the ratification of the Indigenous and Tribal Peoples Convention, 1989 (No. 169), the Committee requested the Government to provide information on the consultations held and the progress achieved in view of the ratification of that Convention. In its report, the Government indicates that the ratification process was still under consideration by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, which was holding consultations with all state institutions in order to, at second instance, seek ratification before the Legislative Assembly. In this context, the Government has requested ILO technical assistance to gain knowledge of the full content of that Convention and experiences of its application in other countries. The Committee takes due note of this information and recalls that, at its 328th Session (October–November 2016), the Governing Body requested the Office to commence follow-up with the member States currently bound by Convention No. 107: (i) encouraging them to ratify the Indigenous and Tribal Peoples Convention, 1989 (No. 169), as the most up-to-date instrument in this subject area, which would result in the automatic denunciation of Convention No. 107; and (ii) collecting information from those member States with the aim of better understanding the reasons for their non-ratification of Convention No. 169 (see GB.328/LILS/2/1(Rev.)). The Committee therefore encourages the Government to consider the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 328th Session and to examine the possibility of ratifying Convention No. 169. In this respect, the Committee hopes that the Office will provide without delay the assistance requested by the Government.

Articles 3 and 4 of the Convention. Protection of institutions, property, and cultural values. The Committee notes the Government’s indication that on 11 August 2011 the Culture Act (Legislative Decree No. 509) was adopted, containing a section exclusively on the rights of indigenous peoples. The Committee notes with interest that section 11 of this Act guarantees indigenous peoples and ethnolinguistic groups the right to preserve, enrich and publicize their culture, identity and cultural heritage. In addition, section 27 recognizes that indigenous peoples have the individual or collective right to fully exercise their human rights, and enshrines, in section 28, the obligation of the State to adopt public policies aimed at the recognition and visibility of indigenous peoples. The Government also indicates that the Indigenous Peoples Department of the Ministry of Culture continues to offer assistance to municipalities for the formulation of municipal ordinances. Between April 2015 and March 2017, three ordinances were adopted recognizing the rights of the indigenous communities of Panchimalco, Cuisnahuat and Conchagua municipalities, which provide that the municipalities, in coordination with the indigenous communities under their jurisdiction, shall take steps to restore, systematize and promote the historical memory of those communities. In addition, the Government provides information on the actions carried out by the Ministry of Culture to protect indigenous peoples’ cultural heritage, such as certificates for indigenous leaders, support for cultural and artistic initiatives, including reviving the original language of the Náhuat people. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the actions carried out, within the framework of the Culture Act, to protect the institutions, and cultural and religious values, of the indigenous peoples. Further, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the outcome of the processes conducted in various municipalities, as well as by other governmental entities, to restore, systematize and promote the historical memory of the indigenous communities and their cultural identity.

Guatemala

The Committee notes the joint observations of the Coordinating Committee of Agricultural, Commercial, Industrial and Financial Associations (CACIF) and the International Organisation of Employers (IOE), received in 2017 and on 1 September 2018. The Committee also notes the observations of the Guatemalan Union, Indigenous and Peasant Movement (MSICG), received in 2016 and on 13 February 2018, and the joint observations of the Autonomous Popular Trade Union Movement and the Global Unions of Guatemala, received on 1 September 2018. The Committee notes that the Government’s report contains detailed information, and welcomes its efforts in this regard.
Articles 2 and 33 of the Convention. Coordinated and systematic action. In its previous comments, the Committee encouraged the Government to pursue its efforts, in cooperation with indigenous peoples, to establish a mechanism for coordinated and systematic action on policies and programmes, as required by the Convention. The Government refers in its report to the creation of the Office for Indigenous Peoples and Interculturality in 2016, as an advisory and deliberative body subordinate to the Office of the President of the Republic, the functions of which include: ensuring that each Ministry has an advisory body for indigenous peoples; evaluating the action taken by the State with regard to indigenous peoples and interculturality; and managing and promoting studies and research on the impact of the policies. The Office for Indigenous Peoples and Interculturality is composed of nine ministries, five secretariats, government institutions responsible for indigenous affairs, and national representatives of indigenous peoples in the System of Development Councils. The Government emphasizes that one of the Office’s priorities is to develop the Indigenous Peoples and Interculturality Policy (PPII) 2018–30, thus following up on a process initiated in 2013. In this regard, an Interinstitutional Technical Commission was established and an operative road map was adopted.

The Government also refers to the National Development Plan: “K’a tun Our Guatemala 2032”, emphasizing that the Plan includes an equality perspective to improve the quality of life of the whole population, including indigenous men and women. The Government indicates that, out of a total of 62 public policies, 34 address the rights of the Maya, Xinka and Garifuna peoples. Furthermore, the General Policy Guidelines 2019–23 focus specifically on indigenous peoples with regard to malnutrition, health, water and natural resources. The following departments with a high percentage of indigenous peoples benefited from public investment: Totonicapán, Sololá, Alta Verapaz, Quiché, Chimaltenango, Huehuetenango, Baja Verapaz, Quetzaltenango, Suchitepéquez and Sacatepéquez. The Government provides information on the activities carried out by various institutions that directly or indirectly address issues related to indigenous peoples, in particular the Guatemalan Indigenous Development Fund.

The Committee notes that, in their joint observations, the Guatemalan Autonomous Popular Trade Union Movement and the Global Unions of Guatemala regret that there is no institution responsible for public policies on indigenous peoples. The Committee observes that, in its annual report for 2017, the Office of the Human Rights Advocate of Guatemala indicates that the 32 bodies created specifically to address the needs of indigenous peoples are facing significant challenges, including the lack of a strong legal framework, and insufficient funds and staff, which prevent them from extending the coverage of the services that they provide.

The Committee expresses the hope that the Government will take the necessary measures to adopt rapidly the Indigenous Peoples and Interculturality Policy (PPII), and requests it to indicate which indigenous populations have been consulted and have participated in the development of this Policy. The Committee also requests the Government to indicate the measures taken to ensure that the Office for Indigenous Peoples and Interculturality has sufficient staff and material resources to evaluate the action taken by the State with regard to indigenous peoples and interculturality. It also requests the Government to provide information on the results of the evaluations carried out by this body. Lastly, noting the existence of several institutions for the protection of the rights of indigenous peoples provided for in the Convention, the Committee requests the Government to ensure the effective coordination and harmonization of the activities carried out by these institutions, defining their legal framework appropriately. The Committee requests the Government to provide information in this regard.

Article 3. 1. Human rights. The Committee previously requested the Government to indicate the measures adopted to avoid force and coercion being used in violation of the human rights and fundamental freedoms of indigenous peoples. The Committee also requested updated information on the status of the judicial proceedings initiated with regard to the events in Totonicapán in 2012 and the rulings handed down in relation to the persons prosecuted in this case. The Committee notes that the Government transmits information from the Office of the Public Prosecutor, which describes the different stages of the judicial proceedings initiated against a colonel in the infantry and eight members of the public safety branch of the Guatemalan Army, who were accused of several offences, including murder, committed during the events in Totonicapán. The Government also provides information on the measures taken to facilitate access to justice for indigenous peoples, indicating in particular that, in 2017, a Secretariat for Indigenous Peoples was established in the Office of the Public Prosecutor and the judicial authorities, and that the Policy on the Access of Indigenous Peoples to the Office of the Public Prosecutor 2017–25 was adopted.

The Committee observes that the Guatemalan Autonomous Popular Trade Union Movement and the Global Unions of Guatemala express concern regarding the considerable increase in the repression of social, community and indigenous organizations calling for respect for their rights. The trade union organizations also allege that the Office of the Public Prosecutor has played a key role in the criminalization of indigenous peoples, particularly leaders who oppose infrastructure projects carried out in their territories. By way of illustration, the trade union organizations refer to specific cases of leaders of indigenous peoples being murdered, detained or subject to acts of violence, which demonstrates the repression and criminalization of their protests.

The Committee also notes the Report of the United Nations Special Rapporteur on the rights of indigenous peoples concerning her visit to Guatemala, dated 10 August 2018. The Committee observes that the Special Rapporteur expresses her deep concern regarding the “increasing frequency of criminal proceedings against indigenous persons who are defending their lands and resources”. The Report also indicates that “Guatemala is faced with an alarming intensification... of violence, which is shown in the increase in the number of murders of indigenous defenders who attempt to defend their rights over their traditional lands” (A/HRC/39/17/Add.3).

The Committee expresses its deep concern regarding the murders, acts of violence and repression of social protests by indigenous peoples. It urges the Government to take the necessary measures to investigate the murders and all the acts of violence reported, and to initiate the relevant judicial proceedings to identify, determine the responsibilities of and penalize the perpetrators. In this regard, the Committee requests the Government to provide copies of all the judicial decisions handed down. The Committee also urges the Government to take the necessary measures to promote a climate free of violence which guarantees the safety of the members, institutions, property, work, cultures and environment of indigenous peoples, and respect for their human rights and all the rights enshrined in the Convention. The Committee also requests the Government to provide information on the outcome of the proceedings relating to the events in Totonicapán.

2. Action to combat discrimination. The Committee notes the detailed information provided by the Government on the activities carried out to combat discrimination and for the promotion, development, revival and practice of the cultures of the indigenous populations in the country (Maya, Garifuna, Xinka and Mestizo). The Committee notes in particular the programmes implemented by the General Directorate of Cultural Development and the Strengthening of Cultures; the training activities on the prevention of legal, economic and institutional discrimination and racism, carried out by the Presidential Committee against Discrimination and Racism in Guatemala (CODISRA) and targeting public officials, judicial officials, and trainers in public institutions (diplomas, post-graduate programme, training course for trainers and training workshops); and the Institutional Gender Equality Policy, which aims to increase the active participation of Maya, Garifuna, Xinka and Mestizo women in election processes. The Government also provides information on the complaints lodged with the Office of the Public Prosecutor on crimes of discrimination, the cases brought before first level criminal courts, and the persons sentenced for this crime between 2015 and February 2018. The Committee observes that an average of 350 complaints have been lodged per year and that eight rulings have been handed down under section 202 of the Criminal Code, which prohibits discrimination.

The Committee observes that, in its 2017 report, the Office of the Human Rights Advocate of Guatemala indicates that the indigenous agenda pending in Congress has been unsuccessful, as “in Guatemala, there has been no change of paradigm regarding cultural diversity, no commitment to combating ‘discrimination’ and no willingness to consult indigenous populations”. The Office of the Human Rights Advocate considers that the cultural relevance of public policies requires a second approach with “inclusive structures in all public institutions, specific policies with budgetary allocations and transparency and participation criteria, as well as affirmative measures and measures to combat racism and discrimination in public and at the institutional level”. The Committee requests the Government to intensify its efforts to prevent and combat discrimination against members of indigenous communities, with particular emphasis on indigenous women, and to provide information on the activities carried out by CODISRA in this regard, and by other competent public bodies.

Articles 6 and 7. Appropriate consultation and participation procedures. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that the provisions establishing consultation procedures contained in the Municipal Code and the Act on Urban and Rural Development Councils did not give full effect to the Convention. The Committee hoped that constructive dialogue would continue in the country on the establishment of appropriate consultation and participation procedures, and requested the Government to provide information on the results achieved. The Government indicates that, in October 2016, a national dialogue for the establishment of basic standards for consultations with indigenous peoples was launched with the aim of: holding participatory meetings and workshops with ancestral authorities, leaders and representatives of organizations of indigenous peoples; defining a guiding tool to give effect to the Convention; and obtaining information for the development of the Operational Guide for Consultations with Indigenous Peoples. The Government indicates that the methodology used during the consultation process as part of the national dialogue included five stages: (i) a territorial approach involving the identification of indigenous leaders, authorities and organizations in the same linguistic region; (ii) the organization of bilateral workshops, dialogues and meetings with the aim of gathering inputs; (iii) the compilation of inputs and their incorporation into the Guide; (iv) the organization of three regional feedback workshops for the development of the Guide; and (v) the process to “socialization” and dissemination of the Guide at the national level. The Government indicates that the Guide is a guidance document for public institutions on how to conduct prior consultations with indigenous peoples. In this regard, the Government indicates that the Guide is in accordance with the ruling of the Constitutional Court of 26 May 2017 concerning the Oxec and Oxec II hydroelectric projects (joint rulings Nos 90-2017, 91-2017 and 92-2017), which establish, inter alia, the mandatory procedures and guidelines to be followed by state bodies for all consultations with indigenous peoples, and require the Congress of the Republic to complete, within a year, the legislative process for the adoption of legislation on the right to consultation. In this regard, the Government indicates that Congress is examining two legislative initiatives on the right to consultation of indigenous peoples, and that one of the initiatives has been transmitted to the ILO by the Ministry of Labour. Furthermore, with a view to explaining the implementation of the methodology set out in the Guide, the Government describes the different stages of the consultation process carried out by the Ministry of Energy and Mining with the Maya Q’eqchi community with regard to the Oxec and Oxec II hydroelectric power stations. The Government highlights the presence of the Office of the Human Rights Advocate as an observer and guarantor of the consultation process, and of the Guatemalan Academy of Maya Languages.
to ensure the translation into Q’eqchi. The consultation process ended with proposals for the establishment of an agreement on peace-building, environmental issues and sustainable development.

The Committee notes that the CACIF recognizes the Government’s efforts regarding the elaboration of the Operational Guide for Consultations with Indigenous Peoples, the content of which was the subject of consultations with employers and representatives of indigenous peoples. The CACIF indicates that, while the Guide is not a legal instrument, its application by the authorities should help to ensure future consultation processes. However, the CACIF expresses concern regarding the lack of adequate regulations to properly guarantee the right to consultation enshrined in the Convention, and the uncertainty arising out of the rulings issued by national courts of justice which have created contradictory case law on the scope and form to be taken by consultations with indigenous peoples. Referring to the ruling of the Constitutional Court on the Oxec case, the CACIF welcomes the fact that the Court attempted to apply a unifying criterion to determine the procedures to be followed by courts and other state bodies when holding consultations with indigenous peoples in Guatemala. The CACIF also indicates that, in this ruling, the Court determined that consultations were to be held with indigenous peoples affected by the Oxec projects within a period of 12 months, and that while the consultations were being held, the enterprise responsible for the project could continue to operate. The CACIF regrets that later rulings ordered the cancellation of licences and the suspension of operations by enterprises, thus directly affecting employers, and also workers in terms of the jobs lost.

The Committee notes the indications of the Guatemalan Autonomous Popular Trade Union Movement and the Global Unions of Guatemala that the legal initiatives to regulate the right to consultation have not been the subject of consultation with indigenous peoples, and that many of the traditional authorities rejected the Operational Guide for Consultations with Indigenous Peoples adopted in 2017. The trade union organizations consider that the limited recognition in practice of the right to consultation has only been achieved through the successive claims filed by indigenous peoples with the courts.

The Committee takes due note of the efforts made by the Government with regard to the consultation process for the adoption of the Operational Guide for Consultations with Indigenous Peoples. While noting the ruling of the Constitutional Court regarding the Oxec projects and the submission to Congress of two bills on consultations with indigenous peoples, the Committee observes that the Government does not indicate whether or the manner in which indigenous peoples have been consulted on the two bills. The Committee recalls that, in accordance with Article 6 of the Convention, the Government is required to consult the peoples concerned through appropriate procedures and in particular through their representative institutions, whenever consideration is being given to legislative or administrative measures which may affect them directly. The consultations must be undertaken in good faith, through genuine dialogue, and in a form appropriate to the circumstances, with the objective of achieving agreement or consent to the proposed measures. Furthermore, indigenous peoples must be given sufficient time to organize their own internal decision-making processes and to participate effectively in the decisions adopted.

The Committee therefore expresses the firm hope that the necessary measures will be adopted to ensure that indigenous peoples are consulted, in accordance with the terms of Article 6, and are able to participate in an appropriate manner through their representative bodies in the formulation of the bill on consultation procedures with indigenous peoples, to enable them to express their opinions and have an influence on the end result of the process. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that all the legislation to be adopted for the implementation of prior consultation with indigenous peoples gives full effect to the Articles of the Convention on consultation (Articles 6, 15(2), 16, 17, 22, 27 and 28). Until the legislation is adopted, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the consultation processes carried out with regard to the administrative and legislative measures which may affect indigenous peoples, and on any complaints lodged in this regard. The Committee reminds the Government that, if it considers it appropriate, it may avail itself of ILO technical assistance in this regard.

Article 14. Lands. In the comments that it has been making for several years, the Committee has requested the Government to take the necessary transitional measures to protect the rights of ownership and possession of indigenous peoples over the lands that they traditionally occupy, in accordance with Article 14 of the Convention, pending further progress on the regularization of land tenure. In this regard, the Committee noted the Act on land registry information (Decree No. 41-2005) and observed that that Title VII “Regularization under the land registration process” will apply until the entry into force of the “Land Tenure Act”, and that section 65, included in this provisional Title, provides for machinery for determining and registering communal lands. In its previous comment, the Committee requested the Government to provide information on the application in practice of the Act on land registry information and its Regulations of 2009. It also requested information on the impact of the measures adopted on rural development and agricultural policy on the effective recognition of the land rights of indigenous peoples.

The Government indicates that, during the period 2015–17, a total of 6,728 families benefited from court rulings on the allocation and regularization of state land in the framework of the Programme for the regularization and allocation of state land. The Government considers that this Programme is in accordance with the Agreement on socio-economic aspects and the agrarian situation of 1996, with regard to the regularization of title to the lands of rural and indigenous communities. In this regard, the Land Fund examines cases concerning the allocation and tenure of the lands delivered or in the process of being delivered by the State. The Committee observes that, according to this information, half of the rulings benefited Maya families, and that Xinka and Garifuna families did not benefit from the rulings. The Government also provides information on the programmes implemented by the Land Fund, including the Programme on access to land through subsidized loans and the Special Programme on land leases, intended for rural and indigenous families who are landless or have insufficient land and are living in a situation of poverty.

The Government also indicates that: (i) the Secretariat for Agrarian Affairs (SAA) of the Office of the President has undertaken strategic efforts, through different mechanisms, to facilitate the negotiated and consensual settlement of agrarian disputes between stakeholders; (ii) the SAA does not have the authority to determine who is the right holder, but makes use of historical land registration studies; (iii) the recognition of land rights is the responsibility of the General Property Registry through the certificates that it issues for registered farms; it also recognizes the possession of land, in a peaceful manner and in good faith, as well as customary tenure by indigenous peoples; (iv) the SAA gives preference to the use of customary law to settle land disputes involving members of the same community or between communities; (v) with regard to high-impact cases, 35 disputes were identified, in which permanent dialogue forums were established; (vi) according to the information provided, in 2017, the local offices of the SAA dealt with a total of 1,425 cases and 485 disputes were settled; (vii) the departments with the highest number of disputes were: Huehuetenango, Petén, Alta Verapaz, Quiché and Izabal; and (viii) among the difficulties identified by the SAA, the Government refers to the difficulty of reaching agreement in a shorter period of time, finding more appropriate ways of addressing problems using alternative methods, and establishing direct communication with persons and groups.

The Committee notes that the Autonomous Popular Trade Union Movement and the Global Unions of Guatemala allege the existence of a trend of evictions by court order in violation of the individual and collective human rights of indigenous communities. In their view, the evictions have had a serious impact on the communities, which suffer a total lack of protection and have no access to basic services, and whose ancestral practices and other collective activities are at risk of disappearing.

The Committee notes that, in the report on her visit to Guatemala in August 2018, the United Nations Special Rapporteur on the rights of indigenous peoples indicates that the “disturbing failure to protect these rights arises out of a context of extreme inequality in the distribution of land and the insecurity of tenure, together with an inadequate registration system that enables third parties to be given title to indigenous ancestral lands. Moreover, there are no appropriate mechanisms to settle conflicts of ownership, which means that disputes tend to come before the courts” (A/HRC/39/17/Add.3). In his 2017 report, the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights on the activities of his office in Guatemala indicates that “there continued to be a lack of protection for the collective property of indigenous peoples, particularly affecting women in the case of land titling and access to credits” (A/HRC/37/3/Add.1).

Noting the Programme for the regularization and allocation of state land, the Committee observes that it is unclear from the information provided by the Government whether progress has been made in the process of regularizing the lands traditionally occupied by indigenous peoples in terms of identifying and registering communal lands. The Committee requests the Government to adopt, without delay, the necessary measures to give appropriate protection to the land rights of indigenous peoples in accordance with Article 14 of the Convention, and to provide information on the areas of lands titled, the number of persons concerned and the relevant geographical areas. The Committee reiterates its request for concrete information on the application in practice of Decree No. 41-2005 and its Regulations of 2009 on communal lands. The Committee also requests the Government to provide information on the status of the land registration procedure. Please continue to provide information on conflict resolution mechanisms, indicating the conflicts that have been resolved and the conflicts that are pending.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Nicaragua

Indigenous and Tribal Peoples Convention, 1989 (No. 169) (ratification: 2010)

The Committee notes the Act for the Partial Reform of the Political Constitution of Nicaragua, adopted in January 2014, which replaces the term “communities of the Atlantic Coast” with “communities of the Caribbean Coast” contained in article 180 of the Constitution, and which recognizes that such communities have the “inalienable right to live and develop under the political, administrative, social and cultural organizational structure that is in keeping with their historical and cultural traditions”. Consequently, in March 2016, Act No. 28 containing the Statute of Autonomy of the Atlantic Coast Regions of Nicaragua was amended, by replacing the terms “North Atlantic Autonomous Region” and “South Atlantic Autonomous Region” with “North Caribbean Coast Autonomous Region” and “South Caribbean Coast Autonomous Region” respectively. The Committee recalls that the Government has recognized the existence of indigenous peoples and peoples of African descent in these autonomous regions, and in the Pacific, Central and North regions of Nicaragua.

Article 3 of the Convention. Human rights. Violence against indigenous communities on the North Caribbean Coast. The Committee notes that the Inter-American Court of Human Rights (IACHR), through its ruling of 1 September 2016, issued provisional measures in favour of members of the Miskito people from the North Caribbean Coast region living in the communities of Kilsnak, Wisconsin, Wiwinak, San Jéronimo and Francia Sirpi in order to bring an end to the climate of violence affecting this region, which stems from conflicts over land possession. These measures include the establishment of an authority or body to identify the sources of conflict and propose ways of building peace... with the participation of the communities affected, and of guarantees to protect persons who have left their communities due to violence and who wish to return. In the rulings adopted on 23 November 2016 and 30 June 2017, the Court extended these provisional measures to cover members of the Miskito people living in the Esperanza Río Coco and Esperanza Río Wawa regions, respectively. The Court based its rulings on the conclusions of the Inter-American Commission of Human Rights, which referred to the “existence of conflicts between members of such communities and third parties occupying the land, which has resulted in multiple acts of violence, including murders, kidnappings, injury, sexual violence, destruction of property and displacement of the members of some communities” during the legal process of verification (saneamiento) and remediation, and reclaiming ancestral land (court ruling of 1 September 2016, paragraph 7). The Committee notes that the Government informed the Court that it had implemented an action plan used by the North Military Unit of the Nicaraguan Army to address the situation faced by community members and occupiers in communities affected by violence, and that it has established a Dialogue and Understanding Commission to take action to promote dialogue and understanding between territorial and community leaders and other stakeholders for the purpose of preventing confrontation (court ruling of 23 November 2016, paragraphs 23 and 31). The Committee expresses its concern regarding the conflicts and acts of violence that have occurred in the North Caribbean Coast Autonomous Region as a result of land claims and verification and remediation (saneamiento) processes. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on: the measures adopted to prevent all acts of violence and ensuring the cultural life and integrity of the communities of the Miskito people in this region, and the exercise of their collective rights; and the measures adopted to investigate acts of violence, determine the responsibilities of and penalize the perpetrators. Lastly, the Committee also requests the Government to indicate the manner in which members of the Miskito communities affected by the climate of violence participate in the development, implementation and evaluation of the measures adopted, including security plans.

Article 14. Demarcation and land title processes. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to provide information on progress made in the demarcation and title processes with respect to the lands of indigenous peoples. The Committee noted the constitutional and legal guarantees regarding the communal ownership of the lands of indigenous peoples. The Committee recalls that the demarcation and title processes of the indigenous peoples of the autonomous regions of the Caribbean Coast are regulated by the Act governing communal ownership for the indigenous peoples and ethnic communities of the autonomous regions of the Atlantic Coast of Nicaragua and of the Bocay, Coco, Indio and Maíz rivers (Act No. 445 of 2002), which established the National Demarcation and Title Commission (CONADETI) to, inter alia, determine and resolve applications for demarcation and title. While observing that there is no specific legislation that regulates the communal property of the indigenous peoples of the Pacific, Central and North regions of the country, the Committee requested the Government to describe the steps taken to identify the lands traditionally occupied by indigenous peoples in these areas, and the forms of landholding.

The Government indicates in its report that it is prepared to continue moving forward with the land demarcation and title process. The Government indicates that, during the period 2007–16, 23 territories were demarcated, titled and registered in favour of indigenous communities, with 16 titles granted for territories in the North Caribbean Coast Autonomous Region, four titles granted for territories in the South Caribbean Coast region and three titles granted in the “special status zone”. The titles have benefitted 304 indigenous communities and cover an area of land equivalent to 28.95 per cent of the national territory. The Government indicates that the legal process of verification and remediation (saneamiento), which is the fifth and last stage of the process of legalizing indigenous territories in the autonomous regions of the Caribbean, is a highly complex national issue. The Committee notes the adoption of Presidential Decree No.
15-2013 establishing the Interinstitutional Commission for the Protection of Mother Earth in the Territories of Indigenous Peoples and Peoples of African Descent in the Caribbean and Alto Wangki-Bocay Regions, whose objectives include mediating and finding alternative solutions to, where possible, conflicts involving others occupying areas belonging to indigenous communities. With regard to the Pacific, Central and North regions of the country, the Government indicates that the authorities of indigenous peoples consider that their ownership titles have been registered and are fully and legally effective. However, the Government indicates that difficulties have arisen regarding the recognition of collective ownership titles and the illegal occupation of land by landowners.

The Committee notes that the Government has implemented, with the support of the World Bank, the Land Administration Project (PRODEP), which aims to facilitate the demarcation, titling and registration of the property rights of indigenous peoples in the departments of Nueva Segovia, Jinotega and Rivas. According to Report No. PIDC536 published by the World Bank, the number of beneficiaries of the Second Land Administration Project (PRODEP II) at 31 December 2017 had increased to 633,627 persons and 92,995 households. The Committee notes the Government’s indication regarding the lack of consensus among the communities with respect to the Project and the official cartographic maps drawn up by the Nicaraguan Institute for Territorial Studies.

The Committee welcomes the efforts made to ensure the effective protection of the right to ownership and possession of land of indigenous peoples, and requests the Government to continue providing information on the results of the processes of demarcating and titling the traditional territories of the peoples covered by the Convention, within the scope of the regime established for the autonomous regions of the Caribbean Coast (Act No. 445) and also for the communities in the Pacific, Central and North regions. The Committee also requests the Government to provide information on the participation of indigenous and tribal peoples in the implementation of PRODEP II, and on the

Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela

The Committee notes the detailed observations of the Independent Trade Union Alliance Confederation of Workers (CTASI), received on 29 August 2018, and the joint observations of the National Union of Workers of Venezuela (UNETE), the Confederation of Workers of Venezuela (CTV), the General Confederation of Labour (CGT) and the Confederation of Autonomous Trade Unions (CODESA), received on 26 September 2018. The Committee requests the Government to provide information in relation to these observations.

Articles 2, 6 and 33 of the Convention. Coordinated and systematic action. Consultations. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the institutional and legislative framework for the protection of the rights of indigenous peoples in relation to consultation and participation and requested the Government to provide information on the activities of the Ministry of the People’s Power for Indigenous Peoples and other government bodies responsible for indigenous affairs to promote coordinated and systematic action for the implementation of the Convention. The Government indicates in its report that the Ministry of the People’s Power for Indigenous Peoples is the leading body for Government indigenous policy and that it works jointly with the Guaicaipuro Mission, which has been operational since 2003 as a body for the coordination, promotion and implementation of policies, plans and projects for indigenous peoples, with the participation of communal councils and indigenous organizations. The Government adds that the participation of indigenous representatives in national socio-economic issues is promoted through inter-institutional commissions and training activities on subjects of concern to indigenous peoples and the provisions which protect them.

The Committee notes that the CTASI refers in its observations to the Declaration of the Waramasen Assembly issued in February 2017 jointly by the Pemón, Akawaio, Arawako and Kariná indigenous peoples, in which these peoples express their discontent concerning, among other subjects, the absence of their participation in the formulation, application and evaluation of plans and programmes for comprehensive national security, defence and development, in accordance with section 11 of the Basic Act on the Security of the Nation of 2002.

The Committee notes that the CTASI adds in its observations, with reference to the establishment of the National Constituent Assembly in August in 2017, that members of indigenous peoples are not in agreement with the methodology used by the Government for the selection of indigenous candidates for the Constituent Assembly because it interfered with the internal processes of the communities for the selection of their representatives. The Committee notes the adoption of the Decree by the Constituent Assembly of 8 August 2017 containing provisions to ensure the full institutional functioning of the National Constituent Assembly in accordance with the constituted public authorities. In accordance with the Decree, the bodies of the Public Authority are subordinate to the National Constituent Assembly and have to comply with and enforce the juridical acts adopted by the Assembly for the preservation of the peace, public tranquillity, national independence, the stability of the socio-economic and financial system and the effective guarantee of the rights of the whole of the Venezuelan people.

The Committee requests the Government to indicate the manner in which the free participation of indigenous peoples is ensured in the adoption and implementation of the policies and programmes that affect them in the competent administrative bodies, at both the national level and the level of the various states, with an indication of the role played by the Guaicaipuro Mission. In this regard, the Committee requests the Government to include information on the measures adopted to promote coordinated and systematic action between the central Government and the states, as well as between government institutions, to ensure the exercise of the rights of indigenous peoples recognized by the Convention. The Committee also requests the Government to provide detailed information on the mechanisms that have been established for the consultation of the indigenous peoples, through their representative institutions, in relation to measures adopted by the Constituent Assembly which directly affect them.

Article 3. Human rights. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to indicate the measures adopted to ensure respect for the human rights of indigenous peoples and that, when violations are denounced, the necessary investigations are carried out. In particular, the Committee requested information on the outcome of the proceedings initiated in relation to the murder of the indigenous leader of the Yukpa people, Sabino Romero, and on the massacre of members of the Yanomami people in the municipality of Alto Orinoco. In this regard, the Government indicates that the 14th Supervisory Court of the Metropolitan Area of Caracas handed down sentences of imprisonment for 30 years. The Government adds that, according to the investigations carried out by a technical commission of the Office of the Public Prosecutor, it was not possible to prove that there had been a massacre of Yanomami indigenous people.

The Committee notes that the CTASI refers in its observations to the murder of five members of the Pemón people in the state of Bolivar between 2016 and 2017 by supposed armed groups with links to illegal mining. The CTASI... observes that, in response to the harassment of miners and the lack of action by the armed forces, a security council was established under the indigenous jurisdiction entitled the Guardia Territorial Pemón to slow down the expansion of mining in the Ikaburú community. The CTASI adds that, according to the complaints made by the members of the community to the Prosecutor General of Republic, the Pemón Territorial Guard is assuming the functions of the police and military authorities. The Committee also notes that the UNETE, CTV, CGT and CODESA, in their observations, report violations of human rights and the disproportionate use of violence against members of indigenous communities in Guajira, as well as the murder of an indigenous leader in a confrontation with a mining union in the state of Bolívar on 24 August 2018.

The Committee notes that, in its comments of August 2018 to the report of the UN Independent Expert on the promotion of a democratic and equitable international order on his mission to Venezuela (A/HRC/39/47.Add.2), the Government refers to the establishment of the Presidential Commission for the Protection, Development and Comprehensive Promotion of Lawful Mining in the Guayana Region (COMPRODEPROIN), which has the objective of formulating and implementing a plan of action to address in a comprehensive manner the problems arising out of the illegal practice of mining in the Guayana region. The Government adds that the National Anti-Smuggling Commission has been established with the purpose of monitoring, controlling and analysing the efforts of all national and regional public entities responsible for producing policies to resolve the problem of the invasion and destruction of protected areas for the unlawful extraction of minerals, as well as the social and health problems of the indigenous and rural communities in the states of Bolívar, Delta Amacuro and Amazonas.

The Committee expresses deep concern at the information relating to the situation of insecurity affecting the various indigenous peoples in the country, and particularly the Pemón people, and it urges the Government to take the necessary measures to prevent and bring an end to the conflicts caused by mining expansion, and to safeguard persons, institutions, property, labour, culture and the environment of the Pemón indigenous people. The Committee also requests the Government to indicate the manner in which the members of the communities affected by the climate of violence participate in the formulation, implementation and evaluation of the measures adopted. The Committee also requests the Government to provide information on the investigations conducted in relation to the complaints lodged concerning the action of the Pemón Territorial Guard and on the manner on which respect is ensured for the human rights of the members of the Ikaburú Community. The Committee further requests the Government to provide information on the activities of the COMPRODEPROIN and the National Anti-Smuggling Commission to safeguard the rights of the members of the communities affected by illegal mining.

Articles 3 and 25. Shortage of food and medicine. The Committee notes that, in their official communication of 1 October 2018, the special rapporteurs and independent experts of the United Nations indicate that the situation with regard to access to health care in the country is subject to serious deterioration. In its observations, the CTASI indicates that persons belonging to indigenous peoples suffer from a shortage of food and medicine, which is giving rise to critical living conditions that are obliging them to migrate to other places within and outside the country, for example in the cases of the Wayúu communities in the state of Zulia and the Warao communities in the state of Delta Amacuro. In particular, the CTASI refers to the health crisis affecting several Warao indigenous communities in the state of Delta Amacuro due to the rise in the number of cases of measles, malaria, HIV and other infectious and contagious diseases among the members of the communities. These allegations are also reflected in the observations of the UNETE, CTV, CGT and CODESA, and in the report of the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights of 31 December 2017 (OEA/Ser.L/V/II Doc.209). The Committee expresses concern at the situation regarding the shortage of food and medicine which is affecting certain indigenous communities and urges the Government to examine the situation, take the necessary measures and provide information on their impact.

Article 15. Natural resources. Arco Minero del Orinoco. Prior consultation. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to provide information on the application of the provisions of the Water Act, the Act on the management on biological diversity, the Basic Act on the environment and the Forest Act in relation to prior consultation with indigenous communities, environmental and socio-cultural impact studies, the payment of compensation and the participation of communities in the benefits deriving from exploitation of natural resources in their lands. The Committee notes the Government confines itself to indicating that consultations were held with indigenous communities prior to the establishment of the Franja Petrolera del Orinoco (Orinoco oil band) through multiple meetings held in the communities. The Committee notes the CTASI’s observations concerning the commencement of mining operations in the state of Bolivar in 2017 as part of the Arco Minero del Orinoco project. According to the CTASI, the operations are carried out by the Parguaza Eco-socialist Mixed Mining Company, without having first consulted the indigenous communities affected in Apanao, Bloque El Callao, Bloque Guasipati-El Callao, Sifontes Norte, El Foco, El Triunfo and Gran Corazón de Jesús. The Committee requests the Government to provide detailed information on the consultations held with the indigenous communities affected by the mining activities carried out as part of the Arco Minero del Orinoco project, and on the agreements reached between the Government and the communities, including information on the terms governing the distribution of benefits.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.
Direct requests

In addition, requests regarding certain matters are being addressed directly to the following States: Convention No. 107 (Angola, Belgium, El Salvador, Ghana, Malawi, Pakistan, Syrian Arab Republic); Convention No. 169 (Central African Republic, Chile, Dominica, Guatemala, Nicaragua, Spain, Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela).

The Committee noted the information supplied by the following States in answer to a direct request with regard to: Convention No. 107 (Cuba, Dominican Republic); Convention No. 169 (Netherlands).
Specific categories of workers

Bulgaria

Home Work Convention, 1996 (No. 177) (ratification: 2009)

The Committee notes the observations of the Trade Union of Self-Employed and Informal Workers (UNITY), of 23 October 2014 and 31 August 2018, concerning the situation of industrial homeworkers who do not work under an employment contract and who are therefore not covered by the Labour Code. The Committee further notes the response of the Government, received on 1 November 2018. The Committee also notes the comments of the Confederation of Independent Trade Unions in Bulgaria (CITUB), received on 1 November 2018, together with the Government’s report.

Article 3 of the Convention. Declaration and implementation of a national policy on home work. The Government indicates that a meeting was held on 27 July 2018 at the Ministry of Labour and Social Policy (MLSP) with representatives of UNITY to discuss the situation of homeworkers, the self-employed and informal economy workers. The Committee welcomes the Government’s indication that a commitment was made to continue this dialogue and that the MLSP undertook to organize a meeting between representatives of the Executive Agency Labour Inspectorate (LI) and UNITY to explore possibilities for cooperation between them. In its 2018 observations, UNITY provides information regarding the implementation of the Convention. It also provides a copy of the National Agreement on the Regulation of Home Work in the Republic of Bulgaria, signed on 24 November 2010, relating to the regulation of home work within the meaning of ILO Convention No. 177. The UNITY further provides a copy of a research study concerning homeworkers’ terms and conditions of work, undertaken by Women in Informal Employment Globalizing and Organizing (WIEGO).

The UNITY refers to its 2014 observations, in which it expressed concerns that: despite amendments to the Labour Code, there is no national policy on home work in Bulgaria, as required under Article 3 of the Convention; the Government has denied “consultation rights” to UNITY on the basis that it is an organization concerned with home work; the Government insists that homeworkers are independent contractors and fall outside the scope of both the Convention and the Labour Code; and piece rates paid to homeworkers fall well below the minimum wage. The UNITY maintains that the situation with respect to homeworkers has not changed. It observes that homeworkers are the most marginalized workers in the supply chain, whose terms and conditions of work are determined by their employers unilaterally, and without a written contract, despite working under the control of their employers. According to UNITY, most homeworkers in Bulgaria are in the footwear and garment industry and work only for one employer or factory. In its observations, CITUB refers to a National Conference it held on 25 September 2018 on the topic of the informal economy and undeclared work, with the participation of Government representatives as well as the President of UNITY and a number of homeworkers. The CUBIT indicates that it was noted at the National Conference that the national legislation does not protect homeworkers, and that the participants concluded that it was necessary to create a national platform against undeclared labour which would highlight policies for resolving problems stemming from all forms of undeclared work, including home work. The Committee requests the Government to provide detailed information concerning the measures adopted or envisaged to improve the situation of homeworkers, and to identify the employers’ and workers’ organizations that have been consulted with regard to the development, implementation and review of such measures.

Articles 1 and 4(2)(a), (d), (e), (g) and (h). Definition of homeworker. Equality of treatment. In its observations, UNITY alleges that homeworkers are not covered by the Labour Code. The Committee notes the Government’s indication that homeworkers who work under an employment contract are entitled to the same rights as other workers under the Labour Code. The UNITY observes, however, that the Government does not require employers to enter into employment contracts with homeworkers and that therefore many homeworkers are working without the benefit of a written employment contract, despite being dependent on their employer and working under the employer’s control. In this regard, the Committee recalls that Article 1 of the Convention defines a homeworker as a worker who performs work in his or her home or in other premises of the worker’s choice, other than the premises of the employer, for remuneration, and which results in a product or service as specified by the employer, unless the worker has the degree of autonomy and economic independence necessary to be considered an independent worker under national laws, regulations or court decisions. The Committee notes therefore that the Convention may apply to wage earners who would not qualify as employees under national law but who are nevertheless in a relationship of economic dependence with another (a natural or legal person). The Committee further notes that Article 4(1) of the Convention indicates that one of the aims of the Convention is to promote, as far as possible, equality of treatment between homeworkers and other wage earners, taking into account the special characteristics of home work and, where appropriate, conditions applicable to the same or a similar type of work carried out in an enterprise. In its observations, CITUB maintains that the status of homeworkers is regulated only by section 107(b) of the Bulgarian Labour Code, which establishes that an employment contract may provide for the performance of work in return for remuneration at the employee’s home or other premises of the employee’s choice outside the employer’s work location. The CUBIT points out, however, that the only difference under the Labour Code between an employee performing home work and an independent homeworker is the presence of an employment contract under section 107(b) of the Labour Code. If there is an employment contract, then the worker receives the rights guaranteed to workers under the Labour Code, such as rest time and leave entitlements. If, however, a worker performs work for another without an employment contract in place, the worker will be considered an independent contractor, even if she or he is economically dependent on that other. With regard to the Committee’s previous comments concerning the application of Article 4(2)(g) and (h) of the Convention, the Government indicates that the Labour Code provides for the conclusion of employment contracts for home work, adding that where there is an employment contract for home work, the worker is entitled to the same rights as other workers under the Labour Code, such as the right to maternity leave for pregnancy and childbirth, as well as childcare leave. With respect to application of the principle of equality of treatment, UNITY refers to Article 4(2)(a) of the Convention, which provides for homeworkers’ right to establish or join organizations of their own choosing, and commends the Bulgarian Government for recognizing such organizations. With regard to remuneration and social security (Article 4(2) (d) and (e)), UNITY indicates that the Labour Code has been amended to comply with the Convention, but alleges that it is not enforced. The UNITY also maintains that homeworkers are paid well below the minimum wage. It indicates that the minimum wage in Bulgaria is currently set at 510 Bulgarian Lev (BGN) (approximately €260 per month), but points out that many homeworkers in the garment and footwear sector earn as little as €89.09 per month. Moreover, if homeworkers are sick or take a day’s leave, they lose income. In addition, UNITY alleges that homeworkers’ payments are often delayed. In addition, UNITY maintains that many homeworkers do not have access to social security and cannot meet the insurance threshold of BGN510 (Article 4(2)(e)). The Committee requests the Government to provide detailed information on specific steps taken or envisaged to ensure equality of treatment between homeworkers and other workers, including by consulting the social partners concerned with a view to identifying homeworkers in an employment relationship, within the meaning of Article 1 of the Convention, who should be benefiting from the protections afforded by the Labour Code. Further recalling that paragraph 13 of the Home Work Recommendation, 1996 (No. 184), provides that minimum rates of wage should be fixed for home work in accordance with national law and practice, the Committee asks the Government to reply in detail to the observations raised by UNITY in relation to the low level of wages earned by home workers. Finally, noting that the Government does not indicate in reply to its previous request whether the provisions of the Labour Code pertaining to minimum age apply to homeworkers, the Committee once again requests the Government to provide clarification on this point.

Article 6, labour statistics. Article 9 and Part V of the report form. Enforcement measures. Application in practice. The Committee notes the Government’s indication that, since 1996, no statistics have been kept regarding the number of homeworkers. The CITUB considers that the failure to maintain statistics constitutes a breach of the Convention, highlighting the importance of having statistics on the number of home workers, in order to bring them out of the grey economy and combat informal employment. It also expresses concern regarding the low number of violations identified. The UNITY also calls for statistics to be kept in relation to home work. In response to the Committee’s previous comments requesting information concerning the practical application of the Convention, the Government indicates that the LI supervises compliance with the labour laws in relation to factory and office home workers. Under section 402(1), (2) of the Labour Code, the LI may visit premises in homes or private properties where work is being performed, to inspect working conditions. The Government adds that from 2013 to mid-2018 there were 17 violations of the provisions regulating home work detected. The Committee requests the Government to provide detailed updated information on the steps taken or envisaged to ensure that statistics are compiled and analysed, disaggregated by sex and age, on homeworkers. The Committee further requests that the Government provide updated information concerning the practical application of the Convention, including copies of judicial decisions relevant to the principles of the Convention, extracts of inspection reports, indicating the number of inspections conducted, and the outcome of such inspections.

Cuba

Plantations Convention, 1958 (No. 110) (ratification: 1958)

The Committee notes the observations of the Independent Trade Union Association of Cuba (ASIC), received on 30 August 2018, alleging the absence of consultations with workers’ and employers’ organizations by the Government for the implementation of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to provide its comments in this respect.

Part V of the Convention (annual holidays with pay). Articles 36 to 42. In its 2013 comments, the Committee hoped that once the new draft Labour Code had been finalized, it would take duly into account its comments relating to the need to amend section 98 of the Labour Code which provided, under certain conditions, for the replacement of holidays by remuneration, without benefiting from the leave. The Committee notes the Government’s indication that section 98 of the previous Labour Code was repealed by Act No. 116 of 20 December 2013, adopting the new Labour Code (the 2013 Labour Code). The Committee notes that section 2(1) of the 2013 Labour Code establishes the right of workers to annual holidays with pay, and that section 74(e) provides that this entitlement shall be for at least seven days. Chapter IX, Part Six, governs entitlement to annual holidays with pay. In particular, section 101 of the 2013 Labour Code provides that workers shall be entitled to 30 calendar days of annual holidays with pay for every 11 months of effective service. Workers who do not complete 11 months of service are entitled to holidays with pay of a duration that is proportionate to the days actually worked. Workers with more than one job are entitled to enjoy effective leave on annual holidays with pay up to a total of 30 calendar days and to be paid the total amount to which they are entitled under each contract. Furthermore, sections 104 and 105 of the 2013 Labour Code establish the requirement for the employer to grant workers annual holidays with pay and to adopt the necessary measures to ensure observance of the programme of holidays.
and ensure that the rest is effective. Finally, the Committee notes that, under the terms of section 107 of the 2013 Labour Code, “if upon expiry of the period for the enjoyment of the annual holidays with pay, exceptional circumstances arise which require the presence of the worker at work, the employer, having heard the views of the trade union, may postpone the holidays or grant the worker simultaneously payment for the accumulated holidays and the wage for the work performed, guaranteeing an effective period of leave of seven days in the year as a minimum.” The section adds that the worker and the employer shall set out in writing the agreement reached and that days worked in this respect are included in time and wages for the purposes of the new holiday period. The Committee recalls that Article 41 of the Convention provides that any agreement to relinquish the right to an annual paid holiday or to forgo such a holiday, shall be void. The Committee requests the Government to indicate the manner in which it is ensured that section 107 of the 2013 Labour Code gives full expression to this provision of the Convention, particularly in light of the portion of that section of the Code which authorizes the employer to require the presence of the worker, in exceptional circumstances, and which allows the employer to postpone or reduce the worker’s holiday and pay the worker the reduced amount of the accumulated leave.

Part IV. Wages. Articles 24 to 35. The Committee recalls that Part IV of the Convention contemplates the establishment of procedures and mechanisms to fix and ensure minimum wages for plantation workers. The Committee requests the Government to indicate the manner in which effect is given to these provisions of the Convention.

Parts IX and X (right to organize and collective bargaining – freedom of association). Articles 54 to 70. The Government indicates in its report that the 2013 Labour Code recognizes and promotes trade unions in the various sectors. It also provides for measures of protection for the leaders of these organizations with a view to ensuring that they benefit from appropriate facilities for the performance of their functions. The Government also refers to the regulations respecting collective agreements and the mechanisms for the resolution of discrepancies which may arise in their preparation, amendment and revision. Finally, the Government indicates that the National Union of Sugar Workers has 2,010 first-level unions and 127,331 members, and that the National Union of Agricultural, Forestry and Tobacco Workers has 8,834 first-level unions, and 381,094 members. The Committee refers to its comments on the application of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), and requests the Government to provide information on the measures adopted or envisaged to ensure that workers in plantations do not suffer discrimination or prejudice in their employment for having peacefully exercised the right to strike, and also requests it to provide information on the exercise of this right in practice. The Committee also refers to its comments on the application of the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98), and requests the Government to provide statistical data on the number of collective agreements concluded in plantations, with an indication of the sectors of activity and the numbers of workers covered.

Part XI (labour inspection). Articles 71 to 84. The Committee refers to its 2015 comments on the application of the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81), in which it noted with satisfaction the adoption of Decree No. 326 of 12 June 2014 issued under the Labour Code, repealing sections 11 and 12 of the 2007 Regulations on the National Labour Inspection System of 2007, which established the requirement in all inspections for employers to be provided with an inspection order containing certain information, including the purpose of the inspection. The Government indicates that in 2017 the National Labour Inspection Office carried out 76 inspections in the agricultural sector, in which it detected 389 violations, 140 of which were related to occupational safety and health. The Government adds that the principal violations detected consisted of the failure to guarantee safe and healthy conditions for workers and the violation of rules respecting the provision of personal protective equipment. The Committee also notes the information provided by the Government on the penalties imposed. Furthermore, the Committee notes that, in its observations, the ASIC denounced alleged cases of prisoners subjected to forced labour in plantations. The ASIC also denounced cases of child labour during school holidays and the employment of secondary school students in state farms during the harvest period. In this regard, it indicates that the students are not paid for their work, but receive academic credits and a favourable recommendation for entry into university. The Committee requests the Government to provide detailed information on the number of prisoners and secondary school students who work in state farms, disaggregated by age, type of work and the manner in which they are compensated, as well as their conditions of work, and the manner in which it is ensured that the students have the freedom to choose whether or not to work. The Committee also requests the Government to continue providing detailed information on the supervision and enforcement measures relating to the conditions of work of plantation workers, and particularly the inspections carried out in plantations, violations of the labour legislation reported and the penalties imposed.

Part IV of the report form. Application in practice. The Committee requests the Government to provide detailed information on the effect given to the Convention in practice, including: (i) recent studies on the socio-economic conditions of workers in plantations; (ii) statistical information, disaggregated by sex and age, on the number of plantations and workers to whom the Convention applies; (iii) copies of collective agreements applicable in the sector; and (iv) the number of workers’ and employers’ organizations established in the plantations sector, and any other information which enables the Committee to assess the situation of workers in plantations in relation to the provisions of the Convention.

[The Government is asked to send a detailed report in 2019.]
Poland

Nursing Personnel Convention, 1977 (No. 149) (ratification: 1980)

The Committee notes the observations of the all-Poland Alliance of Trade Unions (OPZZ) received on 31 August 2018, together with the Government’s report, as well as the Government’s reply to these observations, received on 22 October 2018.

Articles 2 and 5 of the Convention. National policy concerning nursing services and nursing personnel. Consultations with social partners. The Committee notes the detailed information provided by the Government on the measures taken to guarantee that nursing personnel are ensured adequate employment and working conditions, including in relation to career development and remuneration, as well as measures to promote increased interest in the nursing and midwifery professions. The Government reports that a team established by the Minister of Health in 2017 developed the “Strategy for the development of nursing and midwifery in Poland” (hereinafter “the Strategy”), a document setting out a series of actions, agreed in consultation with representatives of nurses and midwives, to be undertaken to improve the quality of nursing care for patients and working conditions for nurses. The Government indicates that the Minister of Health will take the Strategy into account in implementing the health-care policy. The OPZZ observes that the All-Poland Trade Union of Nurses and Midwives was the sole trade union to participate in the development of the Strategy. It adds that the Strategy does not make provision for financing of the actions to be taken, nor does it indicate the manner in which achievement of the objectives will be monitored, or clarify the weight to be accorded to the Strategy. The Committee notes that a salary agreement was concluded on 23 September 2015 between the National Professional Association of Nurses and Midwives, the National Council of Nurses and Midwives, the President of the National Health Fund and the Minister of Health. In its observations, the OPZZ expresses concern that a subsequent salary arrangement was concluded in July 2018, highlighting that both agreements were discussed with only one trade union, thereby discriminating against other trade unions, in violation of the Polish Constitution and the Trade Unions Act. In its reply to the OPZZ’s observations, the Government indicates that the agreement concluded by the Minister of Health with representatives of nurses in 2015 formed the basis for the draft of the relevant resolution of the Minister of Health, which was the subject to public consultations with the social partners. In this respect, the Committee notes the issuance of the resolution of the Minister of Health of 8 September 2015 on the general terms and conditions of contracts for the provision of health-care services, amended by the resolution issued by the Minister of Health on 14 October 2015, ensuring additional funds for the services rendered by nurses and midwives. The Government reports that the new resolution provides for an annual increase of the average monthly remuneration of nurses and midwives in the amount of 400 Polish zloty gross per year (4x400). The Committee notes the Government’s indication that the regulations apply only to nurses and midwives employed by entities having concluded contracts with the National Health Fund. The OPZZ alleges that the resolution of 8 September 2015 discriminates against other health-care sector workers, as it provides for annual increases only to the salaries of nurses and midwives, omitting other health sector professionals. It adds that the allocation of funds for salary increases for nurses and midwives is being implemented as agreed with trade unions representing nurses and midwives providing services on the premises of health service providers, thereby omitting many nurses and midwives that provide services in other settings. In its response, the Government indicates that the resolution of 8 September 2015 does not discriminate against other professional groups in the health-care sector or trade unions associated in organizations represented at the national level, because these organizations can bring matters of significant social or economic importance to the Social Dialogue Council, and express their opinions or initiate negotiations with respect to an agreement with a specific subjective and objective scope. The OPZZ also indicates that, since 2015, the funds allocated to increasing the salaries of nurses and midwives have been drawn from funds allocated by the National Health Fund for health-care services to patients. The Committee notes the information provided by the Government concerning the Act of 8 June 2017, on the manner of defining the lowest base salary of employees in the medical profession employed at medical facilities, including nurses and midwives. According to the Act, as of 1 July 2017, the lowest base salary of an employee practicing a medical profession, including nurses and midwives, was increased by at least 10 per cent of the difference between the lowest base salary and the base remuneration of the employee. The Government reports that an additional increase in the lowest base salary took place on 1 July 2018. The Committee requests the Government to provide updated information on the measures taken to ensure that nursing personnel are provided with employment and working conditions, including in relation to career prospects and remuneration, aimed at attracting individuals to the profession and retaining them in the nursing profession.

Uruguay

Domestic Workers Convention, 2011 (No. 189) (ratification: 2012)

Article 17(2) and (3) of the Convention. Labour inspection and penalties. Access to household premises. The Committee notes with interest the detailed information sent by the Government on measures taken in relation to labour inspection in the domestic work sector. The Government indicates that the methodology used by the labour inspectorate in this sector is based on: specific complaints, routine inspections, operations covering broad sectors of workers at a particular time, and coordinated inspections with an integrated approach (that is, involving action by other bodies with competence in related areas, for example with regard to migrant workers, the work of young persons or human trafficking. for labour exploitation). The Government indicates that there is a protocol for complaints according to which, in the event that informal domestic work is suspected, the household concerned is automatically inspected, together with other households in the area. This meets the twofold objective of conducting inspections in a large number of households while preventing the complainant from being exposed. The Government also indicates that since 2013 the number of complaints received has increased and a special scheme is being devised to detect domestic work done by foreigners. The Committee also notes the information in the report sent by the Government entitled “Inspection of domestic work during the 2010–16 period”. The report highlights a qualitative increase in inspections in the sector through the adoption of measures such as the reinforcement of training for the labour inspectorate with regard to the legislation concerning the domestic work sector. According to the report, many cases of non-compliance identified during inspections relate to infringements regarding wages and situations of vulnerability at work for foreign workers mainly originating from Peru, the Dominican Republic, Paraguay, Bolivia and Brazil. Lastly, the Government indicates that it has received requests from other Latin American countries to share good inspection practices in the domestic work sector. The Committee requests the Government to continue providing detailed information on the specific measures taken or contemplated relating to labour inspection with due regard for the special characteristics of domestic work, and bearing in mind the presence of foreign workers. It also requests the Government to provide information on the number of inspections in the sector, the number and type of infringements detected, and the penalties imposed.

Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela

Nursing Personnel Convention, 1977 (No. 149) (ratification: 1983)

The Committee notes the observations of the National Union of Workers of Venezuela (UNETE), the Confederation of Workers of Venezuela (CTV), the General Confederation of Labour (CGT) and the Confederation of Autonomous Trade Unions (CODESA), received on 26 September 2018. The Committee also notes the observations of the Independent Trade Union Alliance Confederation of Workers (CTASI), received on 29 August 2018. The Committee requests the Government to provide its comments in this respect.

Articles 2(2)(b) and 5(2) of the Convention. Determination of conditions of employment by negotiation between the employers’ and workers’ organizations concerned. In response to the Committee’s previous comments, the Government indicates that the following are applicable to nursing personnel: the Basic Labour Act on men and women workers (LOTTT); the Third Collective Agreement of 2002 between the Ministry of Health and Social Development and its autonomous institutes and the Federation of Nurses of Venezuela; the Collective Labour Agreements agreed in the Labour Standards Meetings held from the 2013 and 2015 Labour Policy Meetings; and the 2018 Health Sector Agreement. The Committee notes that the Government has provided a copy of the Third Collective Agreement of 2002 between the Ministry of Health and Social Development and its autonomous institutes and the Federation of Nurses of Venezuela and the 2018 Health Sector Agreement, which regulate conditions such as hours of work, weekly rest and paid annual holidays, and the payment of special bonuses and compensation, respectively. However, the Committee notes that the workers’ organizations UNETE, CTV, CGT and CODESA assert that, following the approval of the Executive Resolution implementing the single wage scale for all public administration workers from September 2018, more than 90 per cent of the collective agreements concluded in the health sector have fallen into abeyance, as these include more advantageous wage scales. They also indicate that the enforcement of the single wage scale eliminates the payment of bonuses and other labour benefits set out in the collective agreements. The Committee also notes the CTASI’s indication that the number of nursing staff emigrating to other countries in search of better working conditions has increased. The Committee requests the Government to indicate the measures adopted or envisaged to provide nursing personnel with employment and working conditions, including career prospects and remuneration, which are likely to attract persons to the profession and retain them in it (Article 2(2)(b)). It also requests the Government to indicate the measures taken or envisaged with a view to holding negotiations with workers’ and employers’ organizations to determine the conditions of work and employment of nursing personnel (Article 5).

Articles 2 and 7. Employment and occupational safety and health of nursing personnel. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to provide its response to the observations of the CTV, in which the CTV indicated that the working conditions of nursing personnel have deteriorated along with the whole infrastructure of the public health system in the country, in particular in large urban hospitals, including in maternity units and children’s hospitals. The CTV also indicated that murders, harassment and dismissals on the grounds of protests had occurred among nursing personnel and in the emergency services, which are regularly victims of crime and violence. In this regard, the Committee notes the Government’s indication in its report that article 68 of the Constitution of the Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela and section 487 of the LOTTT recognize the right of men and women workers to demonstrate, in accordance with the law, which has been respected by the competent authorities. The Government adds that, despite the fact that discussions are ongoing regarding an agreement to improve the living conditions of workers in the health sector, a group of nursing professionals, including the Executive Board of the Nursing College of the Capital District, failed to comply with the agreements established in round tables in which legitimately representative trade unions and the competent authorities had participated. The Government adds that, through the Neighbourhood Mission (Barrio Adentro), has been made regarding the establishment of a comprehensive and efficient Public National Health System. The Government reports that 24 hospitals were built and 200 operating theatres were renovated between 2000 and 2014. However, the Committee notes the CTASI’s allegations in its observations regarding a lack of medical supplies in the country’s health centres, precarious working conditions in hospitals (where there is allegedly a shortage of water and food), threats to nursing personnel and a lack of fair wages. Furthermore, the CTASI affirms that, as a result of the above-mentioned precarious conditions, on 25 June 2018, there was a work stoppage by nursing personnel in the public sector.

Lastly, the Committee notes that, in its concluding observations of 7 July 2015, the Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights (CESCR) noted with concern “the reports regarding the critical situation of the healthcare system …, due to the severe shortage and irregular supply of medicines and surgical and medical equipment. It is further concerned at the poor state of repair of some hospitals and the reported lack of medical personnel” (E/C.12/VEN/CO/3, paragraph 27). The Committee therefore requests the Government to adopt the necessary measures, in consultation with the social partners, with a view to developing and implementing a policy concerning nursing services and nursing personnel designed, within the framework of a general health programme and within the resources available for healthcare as a whole, to provide the quantity and quality of nursing care necessary for attaining the highest possible level of health for the population (Article 2). Furthermore, observing that the Government has not responded to the comments of the CTV regarding the alleged cases of murder, harassment and dismissals as a result of protests by nursing personnel and the emergency services, the Committee reiterates its request to the Government to send its comments in this respect (Article 7).

Article 4. Legislation on the requirements for the practice of nursing. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to indicate whether the implementing regulations of the Act concerning the provision of professional nursing care (Official Gazette No. 38263 of 1 September 2005) and the regulations relating to the minimum remuneration received by nursing personnel in the private sector had been adopted. In this regard, the Government indicates that the fixing of minimum wages for nursing personnel is currently being discussed by the Federation of Professional Nursing Colleges of the Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela and the body responsible for health with a view to updating and adapting wages to the current situation in the country. However, the Committee observes that the Government has not indicated in its report whether the implementing regulations of the Act concerning the provision of professional nursing care have been adopted. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the outcome of the negotiations held with a view to fixing the minimum wages of nursing personnel. Furthermore, the Committee once again requests the Government to indicate whether the implementing regulations of the Act concerning the provision of professional nursing care have been adopted and, if so, to provide a copy.

Part V of the report form. Application in practice. The Committee requests the Government to provide detailed and updated information on how the Convention is applied in practice, including statistical information on the numbers of nursing personnel, disaggregated by sex, area of activity, training level and function, the ratio of nursing personnel to population, the number of persons who enrol in nursing schools and leave the profession each year, copies of official reports or studies on nursing services and information on any practical difficulties experienced in the application of the Convention, such as the lack or migration of nursing personnel.
